SWEET NELLY HUNTINGDON.

BY MRS. FORESTER.

CHAPTER II.

"This life is very dull and stupid," ran the girl's thoughts; "how I wish something would happen. If only Lord Langholme was handsome and not little, we might fall in love with each other; at least, I don't suppose he would fall in love with a simple little country girl like me after he's been used to all the elegant, well bred London women—not that there's an older or better family than the Huntingdons anywhere," contradicted the little maiden's family pride. "I shouldn't mind being very miserable. I'd rather die of a broken heart than go on living in this utter stagnation. But if he was only handsome and fell in love with me, (I may as well imagine it all perfect, as it will never happen,) how delicious it would be! We should meet and meet, and at last papa would find it out and be furious, and we should be forbidden to see each other any more. Then he would take me in his arms, and kiss me once like Launcelot kissed the Queen the last time, and when he was gone I should grow paler and paler, and at last I should die, and have white lilies laid upon my breast and in my hand, like Tennyson's Elaine. Then papa would relent, and send for Lord Langholme, and he would come and hang over me brokenhearted; and then, when it was too late, the old family quarrel would be made up, and they would plant flowers together on my grave."

And the foolish little maiden, touched by her own pitiful story that she had made, let the big tears gather in her sweet brown eyes, and brim over in great diamond drops from their long lashes. Presently, becoming more cheerful, she raised her eyes, and they lighted kindling upon a great mass of heaven blue forget-me-nots on the opposite bank.

"Oh, if I could only get them!" she cried, stopping short in a suitable epitaph she had been composing on her untimely end; but the attainment of her desire seemed hardly compassable, since the stream ran between her and the coveted treasure. True, it was very shallow, for there had been no rain for weeks; but it was quite beyond a jump even for such agile feet as Miss Nelly's. "I must have them," she said to herself. "I never saw such beauties. Oh, if they were only this side!"

The difficult is not the impossible; and so the young lady whose thoughts had just been centred on early death and white lilies began to reflect on the ways and means of obtaining the tempting cluster of forget-me-nots on the sloping bank.

"There's no one about," she said, looking round mysteriously. "Why shouldn't I?" Of course she could not see that just behind a clump of alders on the opposite side a very handsome young man was stretched at full length, watching her with keen admiration through the branches. Slowly she drew off one of the Cinderella-like slippers and the dainty silken stocking, thereby exposing to the watcher's enchanted view the loveliest little rose-pink arched foot; and the conquest was complete. Of course he ought to have rushed away like Damon, leaving a little note on the bank to say he was gone to keep all other intruders from the sacred spot; but perhaps he had not read Thomson's lines, and the idea did not occur to him, or perhaps he feared to scare the pretty apparition away forever, or perhaps he thought it was no harm; and I'm sure very few men would have acted differently under the circumstances. So he held his breath while the two little slippers came off, and the dainty little feet were plunged half shrinkingly on the pebbly ground of the little stream. Three steps, and then eager hands stretched toward the coveted flowers and uprooted them from their nestling security. But, alas! just as Nelly turned there was a treacherous hole in the sandy bottom, and one little foot slipped in it, and got a wrench that made her cry out sharply and fall back against the bank. In a second the young man had started from his hiding-place and was beside her. Poor Nelly would fain have had the hole big and deep enough to swallow her up altogether; the pain of her foot was as nothing compared to the anguish of having been seen trespassing, with naked foot too, upon Lord Langholme's property.

"Are you hurt?" he cried, eagerly, and without more ado putting one protecting arm round the terrified little form, and standing heedlessly ankle-deep in the water.

"You won't tell Lord Langholme?" she uttered, beseechingly, looking up with such terror in her eyes that he almost laughed. Visions of this trespass being made the occasion of another lawsuit through the rancourous hatred of the two families flitted agonizingly across her innocent mind.

"I won't indeed," he answered, reassuringly; "but don't think of him; tell me if you are hurt."

"My foot! I can't move it," she said, with a look of beseeching in her eyes like a wounded deer might give.

The stranger took her up in his arms, and lifted her quite gently on the high bank.

"Let me look," he said, pleadingly, only anxious now about her hurt; but she blushed vividly, and hid it away under her dress. But the pain made her utter a sharp little cry.

"I did not know any one was there. Oh! what will papa say?" she murmured, turning a wistful look upon him like a distressed kitten.

"Well, but how fortunate that some one was there!" he answered her, soothingly; "you never could have got home alone."

"But I shall have to go home alone," she cried, looking at him with frightened eyes. "Papa would find it out else, and he would never forgive me."

"What is this great mystery? Why should you be afraid of your father and Lord Langholme knowing that you took a fancy to a bunch of forget-me-nots?"

"Oh! because we hate each other so, and are always looking out for quarrels," answered Nelly, quite simply.

"Who is we, if I may ask?"

"The Huntingdons and the Langholmes."

"Are you quite sure the hatred is mutual?"

"Oh yes, quite sure!" replied Nelly, confidently.

"And do you hate Lord Langholme, and does he hate you?"

"Oh! I don't hate him, because I never in my life saw him, and I don't suppose he would take the trouble to think about me."

"He would be something less than human if he hated anything half so lovely," said the young man, with an ardent glance.

"Please don't say those things," entreated Nelly, blushing painfully, "because I'm not used to them, and I don't understand fashionable speeches."

"It's a very old fashion to tell a lovely woman you admire her," smiled the stranger.

"How shall I get home?" murmured Nelly despairingly.

"I will carry you."

"Impossible!" she cried, blushing to her finger tips. "And, besides, you are Lord Langholme's friend."

"What then?"

"He might be angry with you for speaking to me, and papa! oh, papa would be half wild!"

"I don't think Langholme would be very implacable," said the young man, laughing down to the very depths of his blue eyes, and giving his fair curls a merry toss, "and for Mr Huntingdon—can't we avoid his knowing?"

"But I couldn't let you carry me," murmured Nelly, looking shyly at him.

"I'll be so gentle," he pleaded.

"Oh! I'm not afraid of that!"

"What, then?"

"If—if any one were to see you?"

"Why surely it is the most natural thing in the world that, if you cannot walk, you should be carried; one of your own men servants would have to do the same, and I should not be more repulsive to you than they, should I?"

"Oh no!" cried Nelly quickly; "but you'll get your feet wet."

"That would be very dangerous for such a fragile, delicate creature as I am," he laughed.

"Is Lord Langholme at the Court?" she asked suddenly.

"Not now," answered the young man, with another of those smiles that became him so well. "But I wish you would not make such a bugbear of him, Miss Huntingdon; he may have his faults, but he's not such a very bad fellow."

"I'm quite sure I should never like him," said Nelly, resolutely.

"Why? what makes you so prejudiced?"

"Because he's little and dark," answered Nelly with great candour, feeling perfectly at home with the handsome young stranger.

He laughed quite merrily.

"I'm so glad I am not little and dark, then, since you object to those attributes so strongly."

"Oh! I did not mean that."

"Mean what?"

"That I admire you," retorted Nelly, half vexed, half piqued.

"And I did not lay that flattering unction to my soul, I assure you, Miss Huntingdon. Will you do me a favour?"

"Yes."

"Tell me your name."

"You know it already."

"No, but your Christian name."

"Nelly—Eleanor."

"Nelly," he repeated, musingly; "what a pretty name!"

"And yours?"

"Adrian."

"What else?"

He paused a moment. "Adrian Wellesly."

"Mr Wellesly?"

"I hold the rank of Captain in the Guards," he said smiling; "you may give me my title if you like."

"Captain Wellesly—yes, I like that best," said Nelly, dwelling lingeringly on the name, as though it pleased her. "I must go now," she added quickly, though reluctant to put an end to this first landmark in her dull life.

Capt. Wellesly drew back a step or two. "But how are you going?" he asked, with the arch smile peculiar to him.

"I don't know," she said, her face all aflame again in a moment. "I suppose I must," and she put out two little hands beseechingly, as a child who wants to be carried.

He took her up as if she had been a doll and walked through the water to the opposite bank. As he did so, his eyes fell upon the dainty shoes and stockings lying there.

"What are we to do with these?" he asked, putting her down for a moment, and taking up one little shoe with wondering admiration of its tiny proportions.

Here was a new distress for Nelly. If she went home without shoes and stockings her trespass would infallibly be discovered; but to put them on was equally impossible, and, besides, the poor little sprained foot was quite swollen by this time. If ever there were mixed sensations of pain and pleasure Nelly experienced them on this eventful afternoon.

The Port Hope Canadian gives the following frightful picture of the results of intemperance at that place: "A party of four, named respectively Brooks and Bew, with their wives, left town on Wednesday evening, 14th inst. in a drunken state, taking two quarts of whiskey with them. On their arrival at Bew's house, in the neighbourhood of Welcome, they commenced drinking and dancing till they could no longer stand. Brooks, with Bew and his wife, rolled into one bed, while Mrs Brooks lay upon the floor at the side of the stove. About two or three o'clock in the morning, a stick fell out of the stove, and ignited the dress of Mrs Brooks. The fire woke her up from her stupor, and she cried for help, but the other three were too drunk to render proper assistance; as the result, the unfortunate woman was left by the fire a blackened, scorched, lifeless victim to intemperance."

A French actress was travelling from Paris to London, and had for a companion a rich German, who seemed fascinated by the young lady's attractions. They soon became very intimate, and before separating the young lady had persuaded her fellow-traveller to buy her a parure of diamonds which she had seen at a West-end jeweller's. The venturesome German was startled to find that it would cost 500*l*, and would not give more than 400*l*. The actress had a private interview with the jeweller, and paid the hundred pounds difference, so so that the German gentleman might purchase it for 400*l*. and give it to her. The jeweller took the parure of diamonds as directed, and the German gentleman was so struck with its cheapness that he at once bought it, and as he was packing up it went to Fatherland. It is said that the actress, when she called, thought that it was, as she said hysterically, very poor wit, very.

Coughs and Colds.

Sudden changes of climate are sources of Pulmonary, Bronchial, and Asthmatic affections Experience having proved that simple remedies often act speedily and certainly when taken in the early stages of the disease, recourse should at once be had to "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Lozenges. Few are aware of the importance of checking a cough, or "common cold," in its first stage. That which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if neglected soon attacks the Lungs. "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Cough Lozenges, allay irritation which induces coughing, having a direct influence on the affected parts. As there are imitations, be sure to obtain the genuine. Sold by all dealers in Medicines at 25 cents a box.

Mothers! Mothers!! Mothers!!!

Are you disturbed at night and broken of your rest by a sick child suffering and crying with the excruciating pain of cutting teeth? If so, go at once and get a bottle of Mrs WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP. It will relieve the poor little sufferer immediately—depend upon it; there is no mistake about it. There is not a mother on the face of the earth who has ever used it, who will not tell you at once that it will regulate the bowels, and give rest to the mother and relief and health to the child, operating like magic. It is perfectly safe to use in all cases, and pleasant to the taste, and is the prescription of one of the oldest and best female physicians and nurses in the United States. Price 25 cents. Sold everywhere.

Be sure and call for

THE CIRCULATION of the DAILY NEWS is fully one-half larger than that of any other daily journal published in Kingston. The circulation of the old established weekly CHRONICLE AND NEWS is also greater than any other weekly published in the county. Advertisers will perceive that these journals are the best media for attracting public attention in this locality.
