THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

It was in the year 1788 that I quitted Austria, in order to combine arms against the Turks, which at the time was possible in the dominions of the Austrian House. Prince of Coburg was then the model of the Imperial Army, and I was anxious to consult my inclination by serving under a Prince so celebrated for his military talents.

I reached the army, and experienced a share of military danger and fatigue. It is well known that in this war the Turks made no prisoners. Their officers had enjoined to give a ducat for every head that should be brought into camp; consequently both Janissaries and Spahis were emulous to obtain the tempting prizes. This arrangement was particularly fatal to our advanced posts. Scarcely a night passed that the Turks did not come down in superior numbers in search of heads. Their expeditions were conducted with such secrecy and celerity, that they seldom failed in their design, and in the morning it was by no means unusual to discover portions of our camp guarded by headless bodies.

To contract this species of warfare, the Prince of Coburg ordered out strong detachments of cavalry, without any lines to protect them. These pickets generally consisted of from two to three hundred; but the Turkish generals, irritated that their men should be disturbed in their traffic, sent to their assistance detachments still stronger and more numerous than our pickets, which of course produced to the Musselman a still more plenteous harvest of heads. This service thus became so hazardous, that it was thought prudent for an officer previous to his departure for picket duty to make his will.

Affairs continued in this state until the month of August. Several skirmishes had taken place, but without altering the position of either army. Eight days before the memorentous twentieth, I was visited by the Bohemian sibyl. She entered my tent, and earnestly entreated that I would bequeath a legacy to be possessed by her in the event I should die on the day she had predicted; in consideration of which she engaged on her part that should I survive the fearful period, she would gratuitously present me with a hamper of Tokay, which at that time was very valuable in camp by reason of its scarcity.

I really thought the woman had lost her senses. It was true that, in my circumstances, a sudden death was not at all improbable, but there was no reason to suppose that such an accident would occur precisely on the twentieth of August. Therefore I acceded to the proposal, and staked two hundred and fifty ducats against the Tokay of the antiquated sorceress. This merry bargain was drawn up and formally witnessed by the paymaster of the regiment.

At last came the ominous twentieth of August. It was the turn of our regiment to furnish the picket for the night, and many of my comrades were in precedency to me. In the evening, just as the Huzzars were preparing to depart, the surgeon announced to the commander that the officer appointed to the picket was suddenly seized with a dangerous malady. The next in rotation was immediately ordered to replace the invalid. Accordingly he quickly accoutred himself, and came to join his troops; but his horse, which had always been remarkably quiet, turned restive, and reared and plunged so violently that his rider was dismounted and his leg broken. My turn was now my turn. I left the camp with the men, but candidly confess my spirits were not free from embarrassment. The whole force amounted to two hundred men.

Our post was one thousand paces in front of the line, upon our right wing; and close by was a morass covered with lofty reeds. We were without sentinels. Our orders were not to dismount, but to remain, vigilant and motionless, an hour and three quarters, with sabres drawn and carbines cocked. Presently we heard loud cries of Allah! Allah!" and the next minute my horse in the front rank was thrown to the ground by the onslaught of seven or eight hundred Turks, who also fell in a similar number from the impetuosity of their first charge and the effect of our carbines. Now the Turks were acquainted with the ground, and we were surrounded and defeated.

The greatest confusion ensued, both sides firing at random. I received eight sabre wounds, some from the enemy and some from my friends. My horse was mortally wounded, and falling on my right leg, fastened me to the gory sand. The gloomy scene of massacre was only illuminated by the flashes from the pistols, by the aid of which I occasionally saw my men defending themselves with the courage of despair; but the Turks, maddened with opium, made a horrible slaughter. In a very little time not a single Austrian was left standing. The conquerors took possession of the horses which remained serviceable, stripped the dead and the wounded, and then proceeded to cut off their heads and range them into sacks which they had brought for the purpose.

My situation was one of intense horror. Growing tolerably well the Turkish language, I heard on all sides the enemy encouraging each other to conclude their depositating employment, and not miss a single head, by which means they would obtain on their return at least two hundred ducats. This proved them to be well informed of our number.

Before the Turks reached me my horse, by a convulsive motion, left my leg at liberty, and I immediately conceived the idea of endeavoring to throw myself among the reeds of the morass. Many of our men who had attempted the enterprise were detected, but the firing and the increased confusion encouraged me to hope success from the effort. I had only twenty yards to go, and several Turks tried to impede my progress, but I at last dashed safely into the morass. I heard a Turk exclaim, "An infidel has escaped—let us seek him." Others replied, "It is impossible, he is in the morass."

I heard no more, for the loss of blood occasioned a fainting fit, in which I must have continued for several hours, for when I recovered my senses the sun was high in the heavens. In this swamp I was upwards of eight—some of them were dangerous—all sabre cuts, on the arms, back, and breast.

The night in this country being cold, I wore a thick pelisse, which in some measure had warded the effects of the blows. I heard the groans of the mangled horses from the field of battle; with respect to the men, the Turks had left them in quiet enough. I endeavoured to extricate myself from this unpleasant situation, and, after an hour's struggling, succeeded.

I advanced and contemplated the scene of the slaughter; but what language can paint the horror I felt at finding myself suddenly in the grasp of a gigantic Turk, upwards of six feet high, who had undoubtedly returned for the purpose of discovering if any plunder had eluded his former search. I addressed myself to him in the Turkish language: "Take my watch, my money, my uniform; but, O! do not kill me!"

He replied: "All your possessions belong to me, and I must have your head besides," upon which he untied the string which fastened the buzzar cap under my chin, and loosened my cravat. I was unarmed and defenceless, at the least movement he would have plunged his immense scimetar into my bosom. In the most supplicating manner I embraced him by the middle of his body, and implored his clemency; but, regardless of all my entreaties, he continued his occupation of baring my neck.

"Pity me," I exclaimed: "my family is rich; take me prisoner, and you shall have a considerable ransom."

"That prospect," he rejoined, "will be too tedious; only keep yourself quiet that I may cut off your head;" and then he deliberately took out my shirt-pin. He made no resistance to my embracing him, probably through reliance upon his superior strength, or from a remaining spark of pity—which, however, the hope of a ducat for my head entirely extinguished.

As he took out my shirt-pin, I felt something very hard at his girdle; it was a hammer. The dread of so horrible a death induced me to snatch the hammer; he did not perceive it; and had already got my hair in one hand and his scimetar in the other, when by a sudden motion I freed myself from his grasp, and with all my strength discharged the hammer, which was very heavy, at his face. The blow took effect—the Turk staggered—I repeated the stroke; letting his sword slip, he fell to the ground. It is needless to add that I picked up the weapon and thrust it into his heart; I then, with all speed, ran towards our advanced post, and ere long arrived safely at the camp. I was soon seized with a burning fever, and carried to an hospital, from whence, however, I returned to camp in about six weeks, entirely cured of my malady and also of my wounds.

On my recovery, I was visited by the Bohemian fortune-teller, who punctually paid me the hamper of Tokay she lost. I was informed that during my absence many of her predictions had been precisely accomplished, by which she had obtained many handsome legacies. To me this seemed most astounding.

At length there came to us two deserters from the enemy; they were christians from Servia, who had been employed to carry baggage of the Turkish army. These men, as soon as they saw the sibyl, charged her with being a Turkish spy.

We were all amazed; for this woman had been serviceable to us on many occasions, and we had often admired the dexterity with which she executed the most perilous commissions.

The deserters declared they had been present several times when she had related our positions to the Turks, had disclosed our schemes, and had encouraged the attacks which had been made upon us, and that as a passport she had been furnished with a cypher. This convincing proof of her treachery being found upon her, the Bohemian fortune-teller was condemned to death as a spy.

Before the examination, I interrogated her as to the production she had made concerning me. She confessed, that acting as a spy to both armies, she received a double profit, and had frequently disclosed to each the intentions of the other. In fortune-telling she drew many anecdotes from the simplicity of the persons who consulted her, and not unfrequently was indebted to chance for the accomplishment of her predictions. In what regarded me, she said it was to strengthen her influence that she fixed the time of my decease at so distant a period; and that as it approached, she prevailed upon the Turks to attack our pickets on the night of the twentieth of August. Understanding that two officers were before me on the list for that service, she sold the first adulterated wine, and rendered him indisposed; and as the second was mounting, she privately insinuated into the nose of his horse a piece of burning charcoal, which produced the consequence before related.

At St. Mary's on Wednesday afternoon a woman named Mrs Wood was found dead in bed. Her death is supposed to have been brought about by foul means, as there were several bruises on her neck and body. The authorities are on the look-out for one or two individuals who are suspected.

Some months since Mr Goodwin of New York obtained a patent for a new invention of his own, a machinery which would enable dolls to walk with the free action of a perfect imitation of nature. Some capitalists took up the speculation, and the result was the establishment, some three weeks since, of a mammoth manufactory, under the management of Messrs Rogers and Coryell, in which fifteen hundred operatives are employed. The building stands on Green Point, close to the Tenth Street Ferry. It is now in flourishing operation, under the superintendence of Mr James Waterson. It is very curious to see four hundred women engaged, in one room, in the manufacture of different pieces of dolls' dresses; while others are occupied with different branches of the same manufacture. At present it is only miniature ladies running after a perambulator, or jaunty looking coloured men drawing waggons. They will run a hundred feet without stopping, and with such life-like movement that they look like veritable fairies. The manufacturers will soon flood the country.

Coughs and Colds.

Sudden changes of climate are sources of Pulmonary, Bronchial, and Asthmatic affections. Experience having proved that simple remedies often act speedily and certainly when taken in the early stages of the disease, recourse should at once be had to "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Lozenges. Few are aware of the importance of checking a cough, or "common cold," in its first stage. That which in the beginning would yield to a mild remedy, if neglected soon attacks the Lungs. "Brown's Bronchial Troches," or Cough Lozenges, allay irritation which induces coughing, having a direct influence on the affected parts. As there are imitations, be sure to obtain the genuine. Sold by all dealers in Medicines at 25 cents a box.
