CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE CLIFFS OF OLD ENGLAND.

It was an April evening off the south coast of England. The sun had just made up its mind to struggle out from behind a particularly black shower cloud, and give that part of the world a look before he bade it good night.

"That is lucky," said a little man, who was with difficulty hanging on to the bulwark netting of the R. M. S. Conway Castle; "now, Mr. Jones, look if you can't see them in the sunlight."

Mr Jones accordingly looked through his glasses again.

"Yes," he said, "I can see them distinctly."

"See what?" asked another passenger, coming up.

"The cliffs of old England," answered the little man, joyously.

"Oh, is that all?" said the other, "I thought the cliffs of old England!"

"Nice remark that for a man who is going home to be married, eh?" said the little man, turning to where his companion had stood.

But Mr. Jones had shot up his [illegible] and vanished aft.

Presently he reached a deck cabin and entered without knocking.

"England is in sight, old fellow," he said, addressing somebody who lay back smoking in a cane chair.

The person addressed made a movement as though to rise, then put up his hands to a shade that covered his eyes.

"I forgot," he answered with a smile, "it will have to be very much in sight before I can see it. By the way, Jeremy," he went on, nervously, "I want to ask you something. These doctors tell such lies." And he removed the shade.—"Now, look at my eyes, and tell me honestly, am I disfigured? Are they shrunk, I mean, or got a squint, or anything of that sort?" and Ernest turned up his dark orbs, which, except that they had acquired that painful expectant look peculiar to the blind, were just as they always had been.

Jeremy looked at them, first in one light, then in another.

"Well," said Ernest, impatiently, "I can feel that you are staring me out of countenance."

"Hamba gachle," replied the immutable one. "I am, di-di-diagnosing the case. There, that will do." To all appearance, your optics are as sound as mine. You get a girl to look at them and see what she says."

"Ah, well, that is something to be thankful for."

Just then somebody knocked at the cabin door. It was a steward.

"You sent for me, Sir Ernest?"

"Oh, yes, I remember. Will you be so good as to find my servant? I want him."

"Yes, Sir Ernest."

Ernest moved impatiently. "Confound that fellow, with his everlasting 'Sir Ernest!'"

"What, haven't you got used to your handle yet?"

"No, I haven't, and I wish it were at Jericho, and that is a fact, it is all your fault, Jeremy. If you had not told that confoundedly garrulous little doctor, who went and had the information printed in The Natal Mercury, it would never have come out at all. I could have dropped the title in England; but now all these people know that I am Sir Ernest, and Sir Ernest I shall remain for the rest of my days."

"Well, most people would not think that such a dreadful misfortune."

"Yes, they would if they had happened to shoot the real heir. By the way, what did the lawyer say in his letter? As we are so near home, I suppose I had better post myself up. You will find it in the dispatch box. Read it, there's a good fellow."

Jeremy opened the box, battered with many years of travel, and searched about for the letter. It contained a curious collection of articles, prominent among which was a handkerchief which had once belonged to Eva Ceswick; a long tress of chestnut hair tied up with a blue ribbon; ditto of golden, which had come—well, not from Eva's tresses; a whole botanical collection of dead flowers, tender souvenirs of goodness knows who, for, after awhile, these accumulated dried specimens are difficult to identify; and many letters and other curiosities.

At last he came to the desired document, written in a fair clerk's hand; and having shoveled back the locks of hair, etc., began to read it aloud:

"St. Ethelred's Court, Poultry, Jan. 29, 1879.

Sir"—

"You see," broke in Ernest, "while we were fighting over there at Isandhlwana, those beggars were writing to tell me that I was a baronet. Case of the 'bloody hand' with a vengeance, eh?"

"Sir" (began Jeremy again), "it is our duty to inform you of the death, on the 16th of the present month, of our estemed client, Sir Hugh Kershaw, Bart., of Arcdale Hall, Devonshire, and of the consequent devolution of the baronetcy to yourself, as only son of the late Sir Hugh's only brother, Ernest Kershaw, Esq.

"Into the question of the unhappy manner in which you came to be placed in the immediate succession, it does not become us to enter. We have before us at this moment a copy of her majesty's pardon, granted under the Transvaal amnesty act, and forwarded to us by Reginald Cardus, Esq., of Dunn's Ness, Suffolk, which, we have neither the wish nor the will to dispute. It is clear to us that, under this pardon, you are totally free from any responsibility for the breach of the law which you perpetrated some years since, and of this it is our duty to advise you. Your title to succeed is a clear one.

"As was only to be expected under the circumstances, the late Sir Hugh did not bear any feeling of good will toward you. Indeed, we do not think that we shall be exaggerating if we say that the news of your free pardon materially hastened his end. On the attainment of full age by the late Hugh Kershaw, Esq., who fell by your hand, the entail of the family estates was cut, and only the mansion house of Archdale hall, the heir looms, which are numerous and valuable, therein contained, and the deer park, consisting of 185 acres of land, were resettled. These consequently pass to you, and we shall be glad to receive your instructions concerning them, should you elect to honor us with your confidence. The estates pass, under the will of the late baronet, to a distant cousin of his late wife's, James Smith, Esq., of 52 Camperdown road, Upper Clapham. We now think that we have put you in possession of all the facts connected with your accession to the baronetcy, and, awaiting your instructions, we have the honor to remain your obedient servants,

(Signed), "PAISLEY & PAISLEY."

"Ah, so much for that!" was Ernest's comment. "What am I to do with Archdale hall, its heir looms and its deer park of 185 acres, I wonder? I shall sell them, if I can. Mine is a pretty position; a baronet with about sixpence halfpenny per annum to support my rank on; a very pretty position!"

"Hamba gachle," replied Jeremy, "time enough to consider all that. But now, as we are on the reading lay, I may as well give you the benefit of my opinion [illegible] the officer commanding her majesty's forces in Natal and Zululand."

"Fire away," remarked Ernest, wearily.

"First letter, dated Newcastle, Natal, Jan. 27, 'From your humble servant to officer commanding, etc.,'

"'SIR—I have the honor to report, by order of Lieut. and Adjt. Kershaw, of Alston's Horse, at present incapacitated by lightning from doing so himself'—

"Very neatly put, that," interpolated Jeremy.

"Very. Go on."

"'that on the 22d inst. Alston's Horse, having received orders to check the flanking movement of the Undi corps, proceeded to try and do so. Coming to a ridge commanding the advance of the Undi, the corps, by order of their late commander, Capt. Alston, dismounted and opened fire on them at a distance of about 200 yards, with considerable effect. This did not, however, check the Undi, who appeared to number between 3,000 and 4,000 men, so Capt. Alston issued an order to charge the enemy. This was done with some success. The Zulus lost a number of men; the corps, which passed right through the enemy, about twenty troopers, Capt. Alston, and his son Roger Alston, who acted as his aide-de-camp. Several horses and one or two men were also severely wounded, which crippled the further movements of the corps.

"'Lieut. and Adjt. Kershaw, on taking command of the corps, determined to attempt to retreat. In this attempt, however, he failed, owing to the presence of dismounted and wounded men; to the detachment of a body of about three hundred Zulus to intercept, and to the presence of a large body of Zulus on the further side of the pass leading to the valley through which such retreat must be conducted.

"'Under these circumstances he determined to fight the remaining of the corps to the last, and dismounting them took possession of a fairly advantageous position. A desperate hand to hand encounter ensued. It ended in the almost total extermination of Alston's Horse, and in that of the greater part of the attacking Zulus. The names of the surviving members of Alston's Horse are—Lieut. and Adjt. Kershaw, Sergt. Maj. Jeremy Jones, and Trooper Mazooku, the only native in the corps.

"'These ultimately effected their escape, the enemy having been either all destroyed or having followed the track of the Undi. Lieut. and Adjt. Kershaw regrets to have to state that in process of effecting his escape he was struck by lightning and blinded.

"'He estimates the total loss inflicted on the enemy by Alston's Horse at from four hundred to four hundred and fifty men. In face of such determined bravery as was evinced by every one of his late gallant comrades, Lieut. Kershaw feels that it would be invidious for him to mention any particular names. Every man fought desperately, and died with his face to the enemy. He begs to inclose a return of the names of those lost, the accuracy of which he cannot, however, guarantee, as it is compiled from memory, the papers of the corps having all been lost. Trusting that the maneuvers attempted by Lieut. Kershaw under somewhat difficult circumstances will meet with your approval, I have, etc.

"'By order of Lieut. Kershaw.

"'JEREMY JONES, Sergeant Major.'

"Then follows the reply, dated Maritzburg, Feb. 2:"

"'SIR—1. I have to direct you to convey to Lieut. and Adjt. Kershaw, and the surviving members of the corps known as Alston's Horse, the high sense entertained by the officer, etc., of the gallant conduct of that corps in the face of overwhelming odds at Isandhlwana on Jan. 22.

"'2. It is with deep regret that the officer, etc., learns of the heavy misfortune which has befallen Lieut. Kershaw. He wishes to express his appreciation of the way in which that officer handled the remnants of his corps, and to inform him that his name will be forwarded to the proper quarter for the expression of her majesty's pleasure with regard to his services.

"'3. I am directed to offer you a commission in any of the volunteer corps now in service in this campaign.

"'I have, etc.,

"'CHIEF OF THE STAFF.'"

CHAPTER XXXV.

ERNEST'S EVIL DESTINY.

A young lady came running up the stairs of the principal Plymouth hotel, and burst into a private sitting room, like a human bombshell of attractive appearance, somewhat to the astonishment of a bald old gentleman who was sitting at breakfast.

"Good gracious, Dorothy! have you gone suddenly mad?"

"Oh, Reginald, the Conway Castle is nearly in, and I have been to the office and got leave for us to go off in the launch; so come along quick."

"What time does the launch leave?"

"At a quarter to 10 exactly."

"Then we have three-quarters of an hour."

"Oh, please, Reginald, be quick; it might go before, you know."

Mr. Cardus smiled, and, rising, put on his hat and coat, "to oblige Dorothy," he said, but, as a matter of fact, he was as excited as she was. There was a patch of red on each of his pale cheeks, and his hand shook.

In a quarter of an hour they were walking up and down by the quay by the custom house, waiting for the launch to start.

"After all these years," said Mr. Cardus, "and blind!"

"Do you think that he will be much disfigured, Reginald?"

"I don't know, dear; your brother said nothing about it."

"I can hardly believe it; it seems so strange to think that he and Jeremy should have been spared out of all those people. How good God is!"

"A cynic," replied Mr. Cardus, with a smile, "or the relations of the other people might draw a different conclusion."

But Dorothy was thinking how good God was to her. She was dressed in pink that morning, and

Oh, she looked sweet
As the little pink flower that grows in the wheat.

Dorothy neither was, nor ever would be, a pretty woman, but she was essentially a charming one. Her kindly, puzzled face (and to judge from the little wrinkles on it, she had never got to the bottom of the questions which contracted her forehead as a child), her steady blue eyes, her diminutive, rounded form, and, above all, the indescribable light of goodness which shone round her like a halo, all made her charming. What did it matter if the mouth was a little wide, or the nose somewhat "tip tilted?" Those who can look so sweet are able to dispense with such fleshly attributes as a Grecian nose or chiseled lips. At the least, they will have the best of it after youth is past, and let me remind you, my young and lovely reader, that the longer and dustier portion of life's road winds away toward the pale horizon of our path on the further side of the grim mile post marked "30."

But what made her chiefly attractive was her piquant, taking manner, and the chic of her presence. She was such a perfect lady.

"All aboard, if you please," broke in the agent. "Run in the gangway!" and they were off toward the great gray vessel with a blue pennant at her top.

It was a short run, but it seemed long to Dorothy and the old gentleman with her.

Bigger and bigger grew the great vessel, till at last it seemed to swallow up their tiny steamer.

"Ease her! Look out for the line there! Now haul away! Make fast!"

It was done in an instant, and next moment they stood upon the broad white deck, amid the crowd of passengers, and were looking round for Ernest and Jeremy.

But they were not to be seen.

"I hope they are here," faltered Dorothy.

Mr. Cardus took his hat off, and wiped his bald head. He too hoped that they were there.

At that moment Dorothy became aware of a great black man, clad in a white smock pulled on over a great coat and carrying a big spear and a kerrie in his hand, who was pushing his way toward them. Next moment he stood before them saluting vigorously.

"Koos!" he said, thrusting the spear into the air before Mr. Cardus' astonished nose.

"Inkosi Casa" (chieftainess), he repeated, going through the same process before Dorothy. "This way, master; this way, missie. The chief without eyes send me to you. This way; the lion bring him now."

They followed him through the press toward the after part of the ship, while giving up the unfamiliar language he vociferated in Zulu (it might have been Sanskrit for all they knew):

"Make way, you low people! make way for the old man with the shining head, on whose brow sits wisdom, and the fair young maiden, the sweet rosebud, who comes," etc.
