CRADLE OF THE RACE.

Where did the world's first men live? A famous French explorer believes that North Africa is the cradle of man, and he has just led an expedition into the Sahara desert to make excavations that he feels will prove his theory to be correct. He hopes to find a large number of tools used by prehistoric man. In the world's early days part of the Sahara was under water. Later it dried up, and tribes of fierce cave men lived there Now it is one of our most barren tracts of land. It is almost impossible to get water in this desert.There are small oases in certain fertile areas, and these are inhabited by groups of natives, but in the middle of the desert you may go for many thousands of miles without finding one drop of water. Few explorers dare penetrate into the heart of the desert—although great scientific discoveries would doubtless be made—because of the terrible heat. Only a handful of nomads, who lived there since they were born, can stand it. In the day the temperature is over 100 degrees Fahrenheit. By night it has dropped below freezing point.

BOWES STILL PROPHESIES.

A very dry spring that will likely seriously affect the crops for 1931 is predicted by Mr. J. B. Bowes, the long distance weather prophet, who has just issued his predictions for the year. Mr. Bowes says that the entire spring season will be very dry—and particularly so during the months of May and June. This condition will exist all over the North American Continent.

In view of the prospect of serious drought, Mr. Bowes urges that farmers make a special effort to get their crops in early this spring. Mr. Bowes also predicts that the fall months will be very dry.

"In view of the prospect of continued dry weather, perhaps it would not be such a bad idea for those who own wheat at the present time to hang on for a while; certainly conditions do not look any too good for the grain crop for the coming season," said Mr. Bowes.
