THE LONDON SEASON

Never was there so bad a season, never was trade so dull, never was London so dire in the Epsom week, such is the complaint which reaches from all sides, and it is supported by appeals to facts if they be facts of the most stubborn kind. It is said that scores of houses in the very best situations remain unlet, that others are let at little more than half price, that carriages have been put down by hundreds, that establishments have been quietly reduced in unexpected quarters and that petty domestic economies are secretly practised in households which formerly would scorn them. Nor are explanations wanting to account for a phenomenon of which few appear to dispute the reality. Some attribute it with Mr Reardon, M.P., to her Majesty's constant absence from London, some to the after effects of the commercial failures in 1866, some to an anticipation of certain legitimate expenses to be incurred within a few months by an indefinite number of gentlemen who move in good society. Perhaps there are those who see in it the baleful presage of a parsimonious democracy casting its shadow before. At all events, an impression very generally prevails that money is not being spent in London this year so freely as it ought to be, and usually is. It must be confessed that a common observer would fail to detect any visible diminution in the pomps and vanities of the London world. The parks are blockaded, as ever, by gorgeous equipages and horses bought for show, the Queen's Drawing-rooms have been thronged of late as they have seldom been thronged before; pleasure-seeking in its costliest forms goes on with no apparent relaxation, and the prevailing style of dress and entertainment is lavish beyond all precedent.

Mons Edmund de Lesseps, French Minister to Lima, died at Chorillos on the 15th inst. of yellow fever. Don Torribio Pacheco, Minister of Foreign Affairs, died of the same disease at Lima on the 14th. The yellow fever remains much about the same as at last accounts—some two hundred dying daily in Lima. The disease appears to be spreading along the coast, having reached Islay.

King Theodore, it is stated, advised his captains to attack the British by night, but they declined, and descended to their deaths by daylight. Had they obeyed, they would have had a new proof of the power which science can bring to bear in aid of slaughter. Sir Robert Napier had with him an apparatus for employing the magnesium light on a grand scale. At a distance of 600 yards a bewildering blaze of light would have been thrown into the eyes of the Abyssinians, and the British themselves in impenetrable shadow, would have shot down their enemies at leisure.

A most extraordinary sea monster, a regular ringed, streaked, and striped devil fish, was captured in Charleston harbour on Friday, by some coloured fishermen, near the wreck of the gunboat Housatonic. One of the men, feeling a bite, thought that he would play his fish a while, and then draw it in; but to his terror and dismay, and that of his brother fishermen, a huge monster, such as they had never before seen, leaped into the boat, and was so savage that they were compelled to kill it self-defence. It was nine feet four inches in length, and five feet ten inches in breadth, had a square head, with large square eyes, and was spotted on the back, with a white belly.

A horrible story of starvation appears in the English papers. A woman whose only means of support was selling coloured paper ornaments from house to house in London, had her child starved to death in her arms, in the streets. She said she felt it grow suddenly cold and stiff, and examining it, found it a corpse; and the physician who held a post mortem examination testified that its death resulted from starvation, and that, in his opinion, unless the mother was carefully tended she would perish from the same cause. A parish surgeon, who was sent for by the mother to prescribe for the child, testified that he told her that the child did not need medicine, but only food, and that it was slowly dying for want of nourishment. The mother then requested that he would save the child, but he declined on the ground that if he gave orders for food as well as medicine in one case, he must in another. All this is matter of official record.

DR. MEAGHER can accommodate one or two Patients at MAPLE COTTAGE, where they will be under his immediate supervision.
