CITY AND VICINITY.

LECTURE.—The Rev. Mr. Clarkson, formerly Wesleyan Minister in Kingston, is to deliver a lecture here on Wednesday evening of next.

INTERNATIONAL RAILWAY GUIDE.—The November number of this excellent semi-monthly may be considered the best yet published. The guide to all lines of travel on the continent is varied with pleasant reading matter.

DEAD—DRUNK.—On Saturday night a messenger announced that a dead man was lying on the road leading to the Railway Station, Belleville. But he was only dead-drunk. It was O. —— from Kingston. That Belleville forty-rod is deceptive.

POLICE COURT, Saturday.—(Before his Worship the Mayor.)—Edward Lawrence, drunk, $2, or 15 days. Frederick Arthurs, a boy, for being disorderly and threatening to stone Mr. Lanigan at the City Hall, was fined $1.

NEW YACHT.—That enterprising yachtsman, so well known here, Capt. Cuthbert, has laid the keel of a new yacht at Coburg, which he hopes to have completed by next spring. It will have fifty-five feet keel and it is hoped to make her the fastest yacht on the lake.

AID FOR MEMPHIS.—The Kingston Odd Fellows Lodge has voted and forwarded $150 to assist in the relief of Odd Fellows in distress at the city of plague, Memphis. The Grand Lodge of Canada and all private lodges have assisted in the same manner. Canadian Odd Fellows have done well.

INSPECTION.—The Cobourg Battery of Artillery, Captain Dumble, having finished their annual drill, were inspected on Friday by Lt.-Cols. Jarvis and French, of Kingston. The Battery received high praise for efficiency. After the inspection, a board of officers, consisting of Col. Jarvis, Capt. Dumble and Major Gravely, met to enquire into the claims for compensation of Mrs. Patterson, widow of the late Col. Patterson, Deputy Adjutant General.

Bad Principle.

Mr. Mackenzie's notice of motion, protesting against the principle of a Ministry dispensing patronage while a vote of censure was pending, indicates the views of the new Premier regarding the recent appointments to various public offices. It would not be surprising, therefore, if there should be a critical inquiry into the nature and fitness of the appointments made since the opening of the Session. The new incumbents of fat Government offices are shaking in their shoes.—Advertiser.

In Custody.

Mr. Dodge of North York, the parliamentary "artful dodger," was served by Deputy Sheriff Nicholson, with warrants on Wednesday so soon as he left the House. As requested in his remarkable speech in defence of Sir John, he is in a fair way of being taken out and hung.—Ontario.

SINGULAR AFFAIR.—A young woman on Wednesday, in Hamilton, went to a druggist for some arsenic "to poison rats." Suspecting that the vermin were not destined to receive the dose, the sapient druggist would not sell her arsenic, but instead, gave her white precipitate, nearly as deadly a poison, of which, on returning home, the young woman swallowed a quantity with suicidal intent, and it is doubtful whether the means taken for her recovery will prove efficacious. The fatal facility with which the most deadly drugs can be obtained is as disgraceful as it is surprising.

CORRUPTION DOOM.

NEW YORK PAPER OPINIONS.

The Tribune says: "Full life opinion in Canada, like that in the United States, sets its seal of disapprobation on public men who banish morals from politics and the management of governmental affairs. The lesson is worth much to the world."

N. Y. Herald.

"When we had our Credit Mobilier scandal before Congress there was a shameful combination to shield the Wilsons, Colfaxes, Dawesses, Kelleys and Garfields, and this combination was successful. The lesson of the Canadian crushing rebuke to its Ministers should be remembered by our people when the Credit Mobilier offenders come before them."

N. Y. Times.

"Sir John A. Macdonald and his colleagues have paid by resignation the penalty of begging or borrowing election funds from the public contractor, and the Opposition, known to Canadians as the "Grit" party, will shortly reign in their stead. . . . Their transfer to the Ministerial benches may justly be regarded for the present as a triumph over corruption and the vindication of the privileges of a constitutional Assembly."

The Nicest Lot of Tweeds and Heavy Beaver Overcoatings in the city, now at Half Price. FAREY'S OLD STAND, Market Square.

Meditations on Food—Historic, Æsthetic and General.

But I must proceed and leave the further consideration of the beasts of the field which yield their meed of food to all-swallowing man. Yet there is still another four-footed animal which I can not pass over in silence without exciting some croaking: it is a very lively, very jumping animal—the frog. The frog has figured in literature for ages: in the moral writings of the fabulist Æsop, in the dramas of Aristophanes, in the poems of the world-renowned author of

"Froggie would a wooing go
Whether his mother would let him or no,"

and in the works of Mark Twain, this denizen of ponds and swamps holds a conspicuous position. Though for generations he has thus fed the mind, it was not until comparatively recent days that this Bactrachian has been taken to feed the bodies of the bons viveurs of polite society. The only parts eaten are the legs, and these are beautifully white when skinned and very tender. The consumption in France of these quadrupeds is very great; a single dealer in three weeks sent to that country 200,000 of them; these are sold at Lyons, Nancy and Paris at 13 francs a thousand; they are chiefly obtained from Germany and are imported entire.

If we quit the land and take to the water we find that even larger animals than the bulky elephant are deprived of life that omnivorous man may live and thrive; even the huge leviathan measuring 60 feet in length and rejoicing in a slender waist of some 30 or 40 feet in circumference, who to amuse himself whacks the water with its lordly tail making a sound heard easily at a distance of two or three miles—and yet this giant of the deep never indulges his stomach with anything larger than a herring—must die that some little Hyperborean may have a winter's supply of food, light and fuel for the young men and maidens of his roundabout snow house or cabin. The Esquimaux and Greenlanders look upon both the blubber and the flesh of the whale as favorite articles of food; they drink the oil with the same avidity that an Anglo-Saxon dandy disposes of a cocktail, a brandy-smash or a sherry-cobbler. Indeed even civilized men who have tasted the whale report, that the flesh of the young when roasted and eaten with pepper and salt is very good and not unlike beef! It is a favorite article of food with the colored population of Bermuda, and it is not despised at the officers' mess. What a supply of pepper and salt would be needed; yes, one would think that mustard, Worcester sauce and pickles would be also necessary accompaniments to a roast whale.

We must not be too severe upon the poor Northerner for his penchant for blubber and train oil, for the oil containing much combustible matter assists, during the process of digestion, a considerable amount of animal heat and where the sun shines but once a year a good stock of animal heat is essential. In fact, Anglo-Saxons can indulge in similar articles of food when residing in the regions around the Pole. A well-known Arctic navigator relates that he had repeatedly seen his men eating tallow candles, when pure animal food was not obtainable, and this they did not from sheer hunger, but as a positive matter of taste—as fair ladies eat candy—induced by the intense cold of the climate. In fact even the most delicate and fastidious young demoiselle, who would shrink in horror from having her ruby lips touched by a moustache hair—in public, will without the slightest hesitation place in her rosebud mouth pieces of greasy, oily fat, which she would never dream of taking in her slender taper fingers.

The Esquimaux and Greenlanders also partake largely of seals whenever a favorable opportunity offers; and we read in a book of travels of a gentleman visiting a cabin near the shores of Hudson's Bay one day while the inmates were squatting around their evening meal, which they considered was one of more than ordinary excellence. It consisted chiefly of raw flesh of seals, fat of whales, uncooked sea-birds, and the entrails of divers animals. A young damsel—the belle of the tribe was daintily biting the inside of a seal to pieces and coquettishly taking the morsels from between her pearly teeth and distributing them to her admirers, who were grouped around her, eagerly expecting her greasy gifts. But, formerly, even in the land of roast beef and plum-pudding, seals occasionally graced the tables of the noble and the great. We read that at a most sumptuous feast provided by Archbishop Neville, the brother of the great King-maker Warwick, in honor of Edward IV, when the board literally groaned with all the dainties of the day, gathered regardless of trouble or expense from the North, and from the South, from the East and from the West, among the extraordinary rarities were twelve seals and porpoises!

'Tis not my intention to dilate on food furnished by the birds of the air to the human race; turkeys, ducks, geese, chickens, et hoc genus omne, are too common every day affairs to detain us; and the veriest tyro in gastronomic science, even Lord Macaulay's school-boy—knows of the luxurious Romans who had at their banquets dishes composed entirely of the tongues of nightingales and the brains of pheasants, who, yet nevertheless, considered the coarse flamingo precious good eating. All have heard of that celebrated King of the East who had a dainty dish set before him, of four and twenty blackbirds baked in a pie; by the way, the great Reformer Cranmer forbad any ecclesiastic under his control and within his archiepiscopate to have more than six black-birds baked in any one pie. Man gobbles up birds which fly through the heavens every day in the year; nor is the content with their bodies, he must eat their very homes, when the cock and hen in loving union have watched over and reared their chirping progeny. The nest of the Esculent Swallow is not only edible, but is accounted the creme de la creme of dainties—although it looks horrid enough—by the Asiatic epicures. The nest is in shape like a half a lemon, somewhat resembling isinglass in texture, and composed of layers of a soft, slimy substance in the same manner as the common swallows for their domiciles of mud. Some authors say that these nests consist of sea-worms of the mollusca class; others of a kind of cuttle-fish, or a gluttonous sea plant called seal gal; while others, again say that the swallows rob other birds of their eggs, and breaking the shells apply the white of them in the composition of these structures: others, still, that they are made of a substance secreted by greatly developed salivary glands in their builders. The question is evidently an unsettled one. Perhaps it is not well to investigate the matter too closely. The well man has not microscopic eyes! The nests are used in soup, to which they are said to give a most exquisite flavor; they are also employed as stuffing for fowls. Java and China are the countries whose inhabitants chiefly patronize these houses; the former country produces about 250 cwt. annually; the price paid in Canton for the best and purest is about $27 per lb. but in some parts of China $45 has been paid for a catty of birds' nests, or about 1½lb.

From the deep blue sea and crystal lake—besides the monsters already spoken of—many tit-bits are obtained, at least many animals, at the taste of which many members of the genus homo smack their lips with the greatest gusto; though doubtless a like number would feel after eating them a tumult in the region where the heart is if they had been drinking deeply of luke-warm water. To a few of these articles of food we will refer. At first, lowest in the scale of Creation's works comes the Trepang, a creature but little in advance of those tiny animals, those toilers of the deep, who have built up the coral isles of the Pacific and laid the foundations of fair Florida; it is akin to star-fishes and sea-urchins, and wormlike in form. It is esteemed a great luxury by the Chinese and by many of the European residents in the East. The Malays gather the trepangs, or holothurias, in immense quantities along the coasts of Australia, dry them and then dispose of them to the Chinese. Thousands of Malay junks are engaged yearly in fishing for this zoophyte; and English and American ships are likewise in the trade. The trepang has no special flavor, or if it has it is completely masked by the spices with which it is prepared; other members of this family are eaten by the inhabitants of the Mediterranean Coast.

Next we meet crawling sideways and backwards, hideously ugly and voracously greedy—but unvulnerable and armed for war and destruction—prawns, shrimps, all lobsters, crayfish, crabs, furnishing pleasant and agreeable food to those who like them—and the name of such is world-wide legion. The Land-crabs of the West Indian Islands, (which usually inhabit the dark, loathsome mangrove swamps, although infinitely preferring a residence in the neighbourhood of cemeteries which they pierce through and through in eager search for the dead bodies inhumed:) are regarded as quite a luxurious article of food by the West Indians; they, however, take only those brought up in the swamps, these they catch in box rat-traps, and after their capture keep them sometime, fattening them upon broken victuals.

Next comes wriggling along, like veritable sea-serpents and water snakes, the different members of the eel tribe; monsters breed of the slime, like worms, of these, the Muræna were held in the greatest estimation by the bon vivants of ancient Rome, they bred them in immense fish ponds, constructed at great expense; and such quantities had they of them that the great Julius at one of his grand triumphal feasts distributed 6,000 to his friends. In order that they might be fat and well flavored, the Romans denied nothing to their muræna, and oftentimes the patricians would condemn their erring slaves to be thrown into the ponds to these carnivorous fish. The Lamprey was also another favorite with the Ancients. It is as sanguinary in its habits as the Muræna. Formerly it used to be considered a great delicacy in England, and the city of Gloucester was bound to present a lamprey pie to the Sovereign once every year. Henry I died in consequence of having indulged too heartily in a dish of these fish, and Dr. Johnson attributes the death of the poet Pope to the fact that he loved these creatures not wisely, but too well. Some epicures resort to the plan of drowning lampreys in wine; they say it gives them a superior flavor. Eels are still eaten in many parts of the world, and how best to fatten them the readers of the Ingolsby Legends know well.—Queen's College Journal.
