NOTICE.

THE undersigned has determined to do in the future a STRICTLY CASH BUSINESS, and begs to inform his customers having accounts running with him that such accounts are to be considered closed from the 1st of June. No deviation will be made from the above terms.

His object in doing so is to be able to sell to his customers goods cheaper than at present he can do by at least 20 per cent, and he hopes in a short time to prove to his customers the great superiority of a cash over a credit business.

All accounts due are to be paid before 30th June.

The Russian Bear and British Lion.

A FABLE.

A Russian bear sneaked through the wood,
With an ill-will, to do no good;
He hugged and swallowed not a few,
Bulgarian men, and women, too
O! wicked, wicked bear!

He ate the hen, he worried the cat,
He licked Prince Charles, and collared Midhat;
And ever since then he has grown quite fat,
With Plevna sauce, and the like of that.
O! wicked, wicked bear!

As Grizzly prowled along the moor,
He saw a house with open door,
And by the fire an old man sat,
Roasting a Turkey soaked in fat,
O! wicked, wicked bear!

The savoury fumes soon reached his maw,
Which set to work his under jaw.
He licked his chops from side to side,
And stretched his mouth to make it wide.
O! wicked, wicked bear!

In walked Bruin as large as life,
And quickly asked for fork and knife;
Struck his paws upon the fender,
And then shouted "No Surrender!"
O! wicked, wicked bear!

The merry thought, drum-stick, and back,
Like lightning, vanished in a crack,
Then some "Stantinople" mutton
He demolished, like a glutton,
O! wicked, wicked bear!

"Now," says Grizzly, "what's to follow?
What't the next thing I can swallow?"
The tears gushed out the old man's eyes,
And, with many pitiful sighs,
Brought forth some Gallipoli pies.
O! wicked, wicked bear!

"Come, old chap," said the cruel bear,
"You had better at once prepare,
For I have not had half enough,
And do not think you're very tough."
O! wicked, hungry bear!

The aged Turk sank on his knees,
"O! spare my life, good bear do, please;
O! give me longer to prepare!"
Cruel Bruin said—"I shan't so; there!"
O! cruel, cruel bear!

The British lion's thundering roar—
His massive head is at the door;
What, ho! there, bear! what are you at?
What! eat a sickly man like that!"
O! cowardly, cowardly bear!

"If you are hungry, just taste me,
You'll find I'm very savoury;
A little sauce, too, can be had,
That's if your appetite be very bad."
O! wicked, wicked bear!

Old Grizzly trembled like a leaf,
He knew he had been playing thief;
So full of turkey, and so tight,
That he could not for the moment fight.
O! wicked, wicked bear!

"Come to the scratch; fight like a man"
The lion's roar through desert ran,
"Let's play at soldiers, if we can,
Sebastopol and Inkerman!"
O! wicked, wicked bear!

On two hind legs the bear came out;
With bleared eyes he looked about,
The lion bit him through and through,
He cried "Good lord, oh! that will do!"
O! wicked, wicked bear!

To Petersburg old Grizzly ran,
He told the Czar what had been done;
He showed her, too, his blood stained side,
Britannia's mark upon his hide.
O! wicked, wicked bear!

The Czar's brow darkened as he said,
"Of that animal I've a dread;
I told you, Bruin, beware,
Or Vic would surely comb your hair!"
O! wicked, wicked bear!

THE GALLERY OF ANTIQUE ART IN THE PALACE OF THE TROCADERO—ARMOUR, ARMS, AND REGALIA OF MEN FAMOUS IN HISTORY—THE SWORD AND MAIL OF CHARLES THE 5TH—THE ARMOR PRESENTED BY QUEEN ISABELLA TO CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS—THE FIRST PIANO—SCENES FROM SCANDINAVIAN FOLK LIFE.

(From our regular correspondent.)

Paris, July 5th, 1878.

The retrospective art gallery of the Palace of the Trocadero is at last open to the visitor. It is a collection of about 300,000 exhibits such as have never been seen, in so great profusion, on our side the water, and will not be seen for a thousand years, or until the telephone, steam engine, sewing machine, and Gatling gun shall have taken their places among the curious relics of a remote civilization. A visitor from America, unless he has some special object in view, had better waste no time waiting until his turn comes to enter the crowded left wing of the palace, but turn to the right, traverse the portico of the rotunda, and proceed to the right wing. On his way he will, from the arcade, admire the splendid panorama spread out before him, and stop for a moment in the central balcony to look down upon the artificial cascades. However hot the weather, the air is freshened here by the dense spray thrown high in the air by the fountains. On the first floor of the left wing a Spanish retrospective exhibition was inaugurated last week by Don Francisco de Bourbon, the husband of Donna Isabella. The staircase leading to it is hung with antique carpets manufactured in the Low Countries, and what is now French Flanders, for Philip the Handsome of Austria brother-in-law of Catherine of Arragon, for Charles the Fifth, and Philip the Second. In the lobby to the right there is an ethnographic collection showing the styles and costumes of every province of Spain. Facing them are the fresco pictures of Goya transferred from the walls of a house in Madrid, and brought to the Trocadero to be exhibited and perhaps sold. Goya was a contemporary of Watteau. But what a difference of style! He was one of the most audacious colourists that ever lived, and was imbued with the spirit of the coming revolution. When Victor Hugo was a boy at Madrid Goya died there at the age of 93. The Spanish painter was the precursor of the Romantic school which, however, knew nothing about him, until Theophile Gautier made an artistic exploration across the Pyrenees. Two dummies clad in the armour of the sixteenth century guard the door of this Spanish museum. They are the commencement of a series of armour exquisitely wrought in steel and in the precious metals. Charles the Fifth, in the coat of mail which he wore on the day of his victorious entrance into Tunis, is in the centre. The great Emperor is astride of a Flemish horse with a cross of Arab blood, and covered, like his rider, with steel plates in repousse workmanship. His charger is elevated on a square pedestal, and is modelled from ancient medals and pictures. At the corners of the pedestal are the effigies of four mailed warriors. One is the Duke of Alva. His armor which can be seen at the Trocadero was sold to a French Jew for 200,000 francs by the brother-in-law of the Empress Eugenie to pay a gambling debt of his wife. The second coat of mail is of damascened metal, and was presented to Christopher Columbus by Isabella of Castile. Boabdil's silver casque, the sword of Charles the V., the arms of John of Austria, and Fernando Cortes are also in this collection. We again come to a series of tapestries; they are Flemish, and were made in the seventeenth century when Vandyke and Rubens painted for the weavers of Burges and Brussels. Those interested in pottery should look well at the Spanish—Arab ceramics, one of which is a vase of great size, enamelled in the style of the one taken from the Alhambra. An antique Portugese bed, the property of the Duc de Santos, is perhaps the most valuable of any of the wonderful things exhibited in this wing, for Raphael designed the pictorial medallions and ornaments decorating it. Among the musical instruments there is one made by B. Christephori, the inventor of the instrument for a Spanish Queen. She had employed (the legend says) Christophori to quiet the melancholy spirit that troubled her royal husband. To reproduce the musical effects of the Italian choruses, he taxed his ingenuity and mechanical genius. The piano forte rewarded the Queen's patronage and the inventor's labour. We have now reached the end of the gallery from which we descend by a flight of steps to the ethnographic exhibition of the Scandinavian peoples. We find here skulls, skeletons, runic inscriptions, and interiors of huts, houses, and tents, with costumed figures, as large as life, representing the inhabitants by a series of striking tableaux, such as were exhibited in the Swedish and Norwegian departments at Philadelphia. "A Fair Day at Mora" embraces a great variety of men, women, girls, and children of a remote province, where simple ways prevail, and patriarchal customs are kept up. "The Child's Last Bed" is composed from a picture of Lundgrim. The scene is in Delacarlia. A mother is placing a baby she has just lost in a coffin. Another child is sitting near in its cot, wondering what it is all about, while godfather and godmother, with neighbours and relations of the little departed, are standing near. A girl of seven or eight years who probably minded it often, runs forward to place a rattle and some other toys in the coffin. "An Offer of Marriage" is also taken from a painting of Lundgrim.

How Tariff Protection Benefits Agriculture.

(From the Chicago Inter-Ocean).

Benefit accrues through a series of advancing and cumulative influences as follows:—

1. By multiplying the mechanic arts, so that the people employed therein become regular and liberal consumers of food, without competing in its produtions, thus enlarging the farmer's home market.

2. By reducing the distance between producer and consumer, with the effect of diminishing the cost of transportation between the two; dispensing with a portion of the former middlemen, and increasing the number of exchanges.

3. By diversifying agriculture, and providing for a rotation of crops, since the farmer who depends on exportation is limited constantly to the few growths for which there is a foreign demand, whereas the domestic requirement is both steadier and more varied.

4. By relieving the perplexities and evils of a slavish reliance upon the foreign market; for the quantities taken abroad from year to year are so uncertain and changeable as to frustrate every attempt made, at the date of sowing the crop, to estimate and to anticipate the amount that will be wanted, so that there is quite as great liability to produce too much as too little; but the home consumption can be reasonably estimated.

5. By establishing a multitude of manufacturing centres, from which goes forth for miles around a profitable demand for those minor crops, such as pumpkins, turnips, melons, and the like, which the earth produces by the ton, while it yields the cereals by the bushel, yet which will not bear the expense of a long transportation.

6. By retaining in the country and near the field an increasing proportion of the waste of agricultural consumption, thereby enabling the farmer to return to the soil, in the shape of manure, the fertilizing constituents withdrawn by the processes of vegetation, and preventing the exhaustion of the land.

7. By more and more promoting the division of agriculture into distinct branches, as sheep husbandry, the raising of flax for fibre and seed, fruit orchards, vegetable gardens, dairies, cheese factories, bee culture, and the like, with the result of reducing agricultural competition.

8. By improving and multiplying roads, bridges, and ferries, and by cheapening all the faculties of transportation, in consequence of the rapid growth and larger needs of interral commerce.

9. By argumenting the value of land and the prices of agricultural produce, through the greatly increased demand for both.

10. By expanding the supply, improving the quality, and diminishing the prices of manufactured articles, through the multiplication of manufacturers and the growing competition among them for the sale of their products in the same markets.

11. By stimulating the inventive genius of our countrymen to devise many labour-saving machines and better implements, whereby much of the former drudgery of farm labour is transferred to muscles of wood and metal, the power of tilling the land vastly enhanced, and the cost of agricultural production wonderfully decreased.

12. By ultimately bringing the manufacturer to the side of the farmer and the planter everywhere, thus destroying the onerous tax of transportation, and abolishing the intervention of supernumerary and expensive middlemen, as the effects of direct exchanges—an increasing tendency towards which result is now seen in the growth of manufacturing establishments in the rural districts of the west, and in the progressive erection of cotton mills in the immediate neighbourhood of the cotton fields of the south. And,

13. By finally transforming the cultivation of the soil from an ignorant waste of the fertilizing elements into a scientific agriculture, whereupon it enters upon a boundless and permanent career of prosperity.

The more frequently that tariff protection is weakened, the oftener will these effects be interrupted; the more completely that tariff protection is withdrawn, the more widely will these effects be arrested, turned back, and destroyed; the more thoroughly and steadily that tariff protection is bestowed, the more actively and fruitfully will these effects come into existence, and the more permanent will they be. It is utterly impossible to protect the farmer without protecting the manufacturer; for the protection of the former follows as an inevitable corollary from the protection of the latter.
