A SHOCKING STORY.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

In the tumult of horror and amazement that filled my mind, I could still feel a faint triumph stirring in me through it all, when I saw how alarmed and how anxious he was about me. Nothing more passed between us on the way back. Confronted by the dreadful discovery that I had made, I was silent and helpless. Of the guilty persons concerned in the concealment of the birth and in the desertion of the infant, my nobly born, highly-bred, irreproachable aunt now stood revealed before me as one! An older woman than I was might have been hard put to it to preserve her presence of mind in such a position as mine. Instinct, not reason, served me in my sore need. Instinct, not reason, kept me passively and stupidly silent when I got back to the house. "We will talk about it to-morrow," was all I could say to Michael when he gently lifted me from my horse.

I excused myself for appearing at luncheon, table; and I drew down the blinds in my sitting-room, so that my face might not betray me when Lady Cathrine's maternal duty brought her upstairs to make enquiries. The same excuse served in both cases—my ride had failed to relieve me of my headache. My aunt's brief visit led to one result which is worth mentioning. The indescribable horror of her that I felt forced the conviction on my mind that we two could live no longer under the same roof. While I was still trying to face this alternative with the needful composure, my uncle presented himself, in some anxiety about my continued illness. I should certainly have burst out crying, when the kind and dear old man kissed me and condoled with me, if he had not brought news with him which turned back all my thoughts on myself and my aunt. Michael had shown the General his letter, and had given notice to leave. Lady Catherine was present at the time. To her husband's amazement, she abruptly interfered with a personal request to Michael to think better of it, and to remain in his place!

CHAPTER X.

"I should not have troubled you, my dear, on this unpleasant subject, said my uncle, "if Michael had not told me that you were aware of the circumstances under which he feels it his duty to leave us. After your aunt's interference (quite incomprehensible to me) the man hardly knows what to do. Being your groom, he begs me to ask if there is any impropriety in his leaving the difficulty to your decision. I tell you of his request, Mina; but I strongly advise you to decline taking any responsibility on yourself!"

I answered mechanically, accepting my uncle's suggestion, while my thoughts were wholly absorbed in this last of the many extraordinary proceedings on Lady Catherine's part, since Michael had entered the house. There are limits—out of books and plays—to the innocence of a young unmarried woman. After what I had just heard, the doubts which had thus far perplexed me were suddenly and completely cleared up. I said to my secret self, "She has some human feeling left. Michael Bloomfield is her son!"

From the moment when my mind emerged from the darkness, I recovered the use of such intelligence and courage as I naturally possessed. From this point you will find that right or wrong, I saw my way before me and took it.

To say that I felt for the General with my whole heart, is merely to own that I could be commonly grateful. I sat on his knee and laid my cheek against his cheek, and thanked him for his long, long years of kindness to me. He stopped me in his simple generous way.

"Why, Mina, you talk as if you were going to leave us!" I started up and went to the window, opening it and complaining of the heat, and so concealing from him that he had unconsciously anticipated the event that was indeed to come. When I returned to my chair, he helped me to recover myself by alluding once more to my aunt. He feared that her health was in some way impaired. In the time when they first met, she was subject to nervous maladies, having their origin in a "calamity," which was never mentioned by either of them in later days. She might possibly be suffering again from some other form of nervous derangement, and he seriously thought of persuading her to send for medical advice.

Under ordinary circumstances, this vague reference to a "calamity" would not have excited any special interest in me. But my mind was now in a state of morbid suspicion. I knew that my uncle and aunt had been married for twenty-four years; and I remembered Michael had described himself as being twenty-six years old. Bearing these circumstances in mind, it struck me that I might be acting wisely (in Michael's interest) if I persuaded the General to speak further of what had happened at the time when he met the woman whom an evil destiny had bestowed on him for a wife. Nothing but the consideration of serving the man I loved would have reconciled me to taking my own secret use of the recollections which my uncle might innocently concide to me. As it was, I thought the means would, in this case, be for once justified by the end. Before we part, I have little doubt that you will think so too.

I found it an easier task than I had anticipated to turn the talk back again to the days when the General had seen Lady Catherine for the first time. He was proud of the circumstances under which he had won his wife. Ah, how my heart ached for him as I saw his eyes sparkle and the colour mount in his fine rugged face!

This is the substance of what I heard from him. I tell it briefly, because it is still painful to me to tell it at all.

The Way Vanderbilt Succeeded.

When Commodore Vanderbilt was running steamboats he beat all rivals by crowding on steam to the utmost, and even running down his enemy if necessary, to accomplish a triumph. When he went into railroading, he adopted a much shrewder and more successful way, by uniting vast lines and their tributaries under his own management, thus capturing all rivals by sharing with them the immense pool of profits that were made by his skillful manipulation. Messrs. Lawrence & Co., Bankers, N.Y., accomplish a much greater success in stock operations by their new Combination Method of dealing. By this system the orders of thousands of customers are pooled into one vast sum and co-operated under the most experienced management, thus giving to each shareholder all the benefits of large capital and best skill. Profits divided monthly. Any amount from $5 to $25,000 can be used with great success. $25 will make $75 profit. $80 would return $720 or 9 per cent on the stock during the month, according to the market. The new circular (mailed free) has "two unerring rules for success" and full explanation, so that any one can operate profitably. Stocks and bonds wanted. Government bonds supplied. Apply to Lawrence & Co., Bankers, 57 Exchange Place, N.Y. City.
