FRIDAY EVEN'G, AUG. 3, 1877.

A SON'S KISS IN THE SUNSHINE.

Two little arms around a neck so white;
Two little rubby lips that warmly kiss;
Two pale pink lips that, wilfully remiss,
Strive to escape them dodging left and right.
Two eyes of azure, dancing with delight,
Bright as the sunshine, swimming o'er with bliss,
Gazing into the fathomless abyss
Of hazel eyes, with soul sun radiance bright;
A little nez retrousse, though but slight
In its divergence from true symmetry;
Two tiny ears; clusters of curls that flight
Like warring waves; two rosy cheeks; a wee
White dimpled chin; the whole as fair a sight
As ever mortal might expect to see!

So thinks the gray, grave man, who stoops
To fasten in his daughter's hair
The rose he holds—the rose that droops
In the warm summer air,
And faintly breathes a perfumed prayer,
That round the honey sweetness at her breast
Folds her pale petals—nestles softly there,
And sinks to rest!
So in the stillness of the night,
With folded hands and down bent head,
The mother in her robe of white,
Kneeling beside her bed,
Utters the prayer so often said—
Then folds her sweet son fondly to her breast,
Pillowing gently there his curly head,
And sinks to rest!

THE PREMIER ON PROHIBITION LEGISLATION.

EXTRACT FROM HON. A. MACKENZIE'S COLBORNE SPEECH.

I have observed that some measures are still asked for by the public. One of these has reference to a question which relates very much to our social system, to the advancement of the morals of our people, and to the restriction and prevention of a system of degradation which has spread to a vast extent an innumerable train of evils through the country. In a land of peace and plenty like ours there must be some governing cause for the destitution which is so prevalent in some places, demoralization in others, and for the insanity, which appears to be increasing to such an extent in others. All our asylums are full, our prisons and penitentiaries are overflowing, and there has been for many years a growing sentiment in the country that the cure for all these evils to a great extent must rest in limiting, if not in destroying, the sale of alcoholic liquors. (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) So far as I am concerned, I recollect very well, exactly thirty years ago, that I published my first address to the people in my own locality in the shape of a report from a temperance society in favour of the principle of prohibition, as one which is justified by all the claims that the people have on legislation by their rulers; and from that day to this I have never ceased to believe in the absolute right of the people to enter on a course of legislation which would have that effect. (Loud cheers.) At the same time I have always taken the ground that until public sentiment had reached such an advanced stage of maturity that we would be quite certain of a very large majority in favour of such a measure, it would be unwise and impolitic to attempt to enforce a total prohibition of the traffic. Whether that time has now come or not rests with the electorate of the country to say. Some years before Confederation, a bill such as is called in England a Permissive Liquor Bill, was passed by the late Parliament of Canada, which put in the hands of the people to determine in their respective localities whether they would prevent the licensing of houses for the sale of liquors. A vote has been taken on that measure in many counties in Canada during the last twelve months. In some cases it has been defeated; in others it has been carried, sometimes by small and sometimes by large majorities, but in every instance it is quite apparent that the agitation in the direction of prohibition has acquired considerable strength. I was greatly amused last session to find that some prominent gentlemen on the Opposition side of the house were willing to vote that the Government of the Dominion should legislate on this subject. Sir John Macdonald voted for it, and I have no doubt he delivered a speech when he was here strongly in favor of it. (Loud laughter.) I must assume that he did, because he declared by his vote last session that we should have some legislation on the subject, and I know that he is too honorable a man to ask us to do what he would not be prepared to do himself. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) I have not the least doubt that if you ever have a contest on the temperance question pending in this county, the cause of prohibition or restriction will derive additional strength from Sir John's having so ably advocated it here last year. (Renewed laughter.) There was one amusing incident occurred in the house last session with regard to this question. Mr. Appleby, member for Carleton, N.B., a clever young lawyer and a strong temperance man, got up immediately after Sir John Macdonald had made his speech, and said, "Will the hon. member for Kingston bind himself, in Parliament and out of it, to advocate the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law? If he will get up in his place at this moment and say he will, I pledge him my support, notwithstanding our political differences." Up to the present moment Sir John has not, I believe, made any response to that question. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) If he has, I have not heard of it; but you may ask him the next time he comes here to deliver a speech. (Hear, hear.) The motion in the house to which I have referred was set aside by an amendment moved by Mr. G. W. Ross, one of my supporters in the House, the representative of West Middlesex, a constituency adjoining my own, and one of the ablest and most effective advocates of temperance in Canada. (Hear, hear and cheers.) His amendment was to the effect that until the courts had decided where the jurisdiction lay in such matters it was inexpedient to pass such a vote. Every one in the House knew that the question was then before the Supreme Court to decide whether it was the Local Legislatures or the House of Commons which had the right to legislate on the subject of the trade in alcoholic liquors. If the Premier of Ontario finds that the decision of the Court is that of the jurisdiction lies within his Province to deal with the matter he will doubtless deal with it in accordance with the expressed wishes of the people. If it comes within the Province of myself and my colleagues we shall be equally bound and equally glad to give effect to the popular will in the matter. My impression at present is that in whichever of the two Legislatures the jurisdiction may ultimately be found to lie, legislation in the first place should be in the direction of making your Permissive Bill better adapted for its purposes than it seems to be at present (here, here, and loud cheers), and whenever the country seems to be ready for further advances in that matter no doubt the Legislature of the time, and the Ministry of the time will prove themselves equal to the occasion. (Cheers.) It is a serious thing for a Minister to pronounce dogmatically at this stage of the temperance question what shape legislation may take in the course of a few years; but I can say this much, that my colleagues and I take the deepest interest in the matter, and shall endeavor to do in this, as in other matters that come under our review, what is best in the interests of the people. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)
