BOTH IN ERROR.

"Your fare, please?"

The daintily-attired lady addressed glanced up in surprise to the familiar face, whose brown eyes had a mirthful gleam as they met her own.

"Mr. Carroll!"

"Conductor of Number Four, and very much at your service, Miss Hamilton," said the young man, doffing his cap with a bow that would have graced a drawing-room.

"You are surely jesting?"

There was something in this that roused the warm and hasty temper of our hero.

"It isn't likely to be much of a jest to me. What a pity it is that I should be reduced by the misfortune of a friend to such a necessity as this!"

"That depends on how you look at it," said the lady icily; "you know my father's position——"

"Certainly," interrupted the young man; "and now that you know mine, our little romance, which was very pleasant while it lasted, will have to end, I suppose?"

"Very well; let it be so."

The car, which had only a few in it when this conversation commenced, was now nearly full, and Arthur Carroll turned away to attend to the duties of his office.

But as he passed around to collect his fare, his eyes rested more than once on the partly averted face, which looked strangely pale in the dim twilight. A feeling of yearning tenderness swept over him, and passing by the place she sat, he said, hurriedly:

"Ida—Miss Hamilton, I fear I spoke too harshly; if you will suffer me to explain——"

"There is nothing to explain," said Ida, rising to her feet. "I think I understand you fully. Please stop the car; I get out here."

Arthur mechanically gave the signal. The silken robe swept past him with a faint rustle, leaving upon the air the perfume of the rose upon her breast.

With a dazed bewildered feeling, the young man watched the erect and graceful figure, which never vouchsafed him a glance, until it disappeared.

"Can it be possible for me to be so deceived in her?" he thought. "I would have staked my life on Ida's love for me, and that it was for me alone. But what am I to think now? Before the dawning of another day, I will know."

As Arthur stood upon the steps of Mr. Hamilton's stately mansion, he saw that there was no light from any part of it except the library.

"I fear Ida is not at home," he thought.

But she was, so the servant said who answered the bell. He gave the man his name and errand, who returned almost immediately, saying:

"Miss Hamilton is busy, and begs to be excused."

"It is better so," muttered the young man, as he descended into the street, he scarcely knew how. "Had I seen her, I might have been fool enough to let her know how baseless her apprehensions were."

Passing swiftly along, Arthur turned into a by-street, where the houses were few and scattered, and, pausing in front of a wooden building, he went in.

Ascending the stairs, he found himself in a plain, neatly-furnished room, where a young man sat, about his own age, his arm in a sling, and a plaster on one of his temples.

"How do you find yourself to-night, old fellow?"

"So nearly recovered that I shall resume my duties to-morrow," responded John Ainslie with a smile; "which, I think, you will be glad to learn."

"Well, I don't know. I'm glad to have you up again, but I've enjoyed the excitement and novelty on the whole, especially the astonishment among such of my acquaintances as I chanced to meet. It has certainly given me a revelation in one direction, which, however unexpected and painful, will prevent my making a life-long mistake. I don't want you to do so until you are strong enough, but if you think you are able to go back, I believe I will leave town for a few weeks."

Arthur put his resolution into effect early the following morning, telling no one of his design or destination. In fact, he scarcely knew or cared whither he went, his sole motive in going at all being to escape from the wounded and bitter feeling at his heart, and which at times seemed more than he could bear.

He had been gone about two months when he received a letter from John Ainslie, on the envelope of which were various postmarks, obtained in following his erratic movements.

It was as follows:

"FRIEND ARTHUR,—I have been thinking a good deal lately about what you told me in regard to Miss Hamilton, and wondering if you knew of her father's failure, and which occurred, as I have learned since, the day I was hurt, and you so kindly took my place. It seems that Mr. Hamilton lost everything; even his house was attached, and all his beautiful furniture sold by auction. His daughter, Ida, I'm told, supports them both by teaching, her father being a good deal broken in body and mind since his misfortune. She teaches in a school a few miles out, but was in town yesterday, and getting on my car in leaving the boat, I chanced to see her. She was dressed very plainly, and so altered that I should not have known her but for her beautiful hair and eyes. It seems to be the general impression that you broke your engagement on account of her father's loss of fortune; and knowing how far from the truth this is, and believing that you were entirely ignorant of the fact at the time you left town, I thought I would write and tell you of it.—Your friend truly,

JOHN AINSLIE."

Arthur was not long in reaching town after reading this. He went directly to his rooms, finding on his desk a small package and a letter.

"The letter came the day you left," said the landlady, "and the package a few days after; but as you left no directions about sending anything, I kept them for you."

The package contained some letters and a ring, whose costly diamond sparkled like a dew-drop as it fell upon the desk.

How well he remembered placing it upon the small white hand, and all the glowing hopes that made his heart beat so high!

By the date of the letter Arthur saw that it was written the morning after his attempt to see the writer. It ran as follows:

"MR. CARROLL,—Owing to an unfortunate blunder, the servant did not give me the right name when you called last evening.

"I have been thinking that perhaps I was too hasty in the conclusions I drew from what you said at our last interview, and which occurred at a time when I was feeling wounded and humiliated by my altered circumstances, and so more prone to take offence.

"I infer that you have also met with reverses, but if you think any change in your outward surroundings could make any change in me you do me a great wrong.

"If there is anything to explain I shall be glad to see or hear from you. Failing to do so, I will return your letters and the ring you gave me, glad to know, ere it was too late, how worthless is the love you professed to feel for "IDA HAMILTON."

The writer of the above letter sat alone in the rustic school-house to which she had been confined many weary months, with but brief seasons for rest and relaxation.

There had been a dull throbbing pain in her temples all day, making the shuffle of little feet on the bare floor, the murmur of childish voices, almost unendurable.

But they had all vanished now, and she sat alone in the gathering twilight, alone with her troubled thoughts and mournful recollections. Never had life seemed so wearisome to her, so void of all joy and brightness.

The hardest thing to bear was the consciousness that, in spite of his unworthiness, her thoughts would turn with regretful tenderness to him who had obtained too strong a hold on her heart and life to be easily dislodged.

"I would never have forsaken him thus," she murmured through her fast-falling tears. "When misfortune came, I would have clung all the more closely to him."

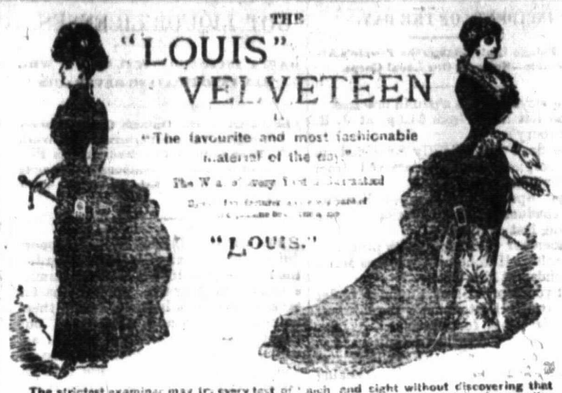
Hearing a step upon the threshold, Ida raised her head, and the object of her thoughts stood before her.

"Nay, do not turn away from me," he cried, as the bewildered girl shrank from that eagerly-extended hand. "I have only just received the letter you wrote me so many weeks ago. Nor did I know until recently of your father's failure, and the consequent change in your circumstances."

"It was all occasioned by my own stupid blunder," said Arthur, after the mutual explanations that followed, and the two were sitting together in loving and happy converse.

"Oh, no," smiled Ida; "I cannot let you take the blame. We were both in error."

THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN



"The favourite and most fashionable material of the day."
"LOUIS."

The strictest examiner may try every test of touch and sight without discovering that these are other than the Genoa Velvets which they so closely resemble, while the peculiar arrangements resulting in the fast woven pile render them to stand interminable and rough wear, which would ruin real velvets at four times the price. For Costumes and Trimmings it is unequalled, and in fact for all purposes for which Silk Velvet may be used we specially recommend the "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.

LOUIS VELVETEEN. FOR HOUSE DECORATIONS & UPHOLSTERY THE LOUIS VELVETEEN Is most effectual, both on account of its durability and beautiful appearance, and is admirably suited for Curtains, Table Covers, Screens, Sofa Cushions, and for covering Bookshelves, Brackets, &c., &c. For NEEDLEWORK also this Velveteen offers great advantages, as it can be procured in so many shades, and is easy to work upon, soft, rich, velvety, and durable. The LOUIS VELVETEEN offers a most useful material for artistic decorating at little cost.

Every yard of the genuine bears the name LOUIS.

I have made an analysis of samples of the Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil, prepared by the Puttner Emulsion Co., and they have explained to me the details of their process. The ingredients used, and the mechanical processes to which they are successively subjected, enable this Company to prepare a permanent Emulsion without the use of acids or alkalies. This preparation has been known to me for many years, and when carefully prepared is certainly a great improvement upon the Crude Cod Liver Oil, not only being milder in flavor, but having the more substantial advantage of being in the best form for digestion or assimilation.

The Dude Collar's Brief Day.

The dude collar, the tall, stiff choker, resembling a wrist band, which has been so much caricatured, has had its day. Though not entirely extinct, it only flourishes as a last relic around the necks of a few superannuated sports and second-class mashers. It has been superseded by a somewhat longer collar, known as the "dog-eared," with the ends bent over in front.—N. Y. World.
