THE MYSTERY SOLVED.

"Nonsense! I shall not marry at all."

"Why, you certainly mean to marry John Brant?"

"Assuredly I do not. He is passable, that's all."

"Then it will be Harry Rogers."

"Never! Harry Rogers is not endurable with his mild ways and his meek courtesy."

"That will do to tell me, Miss May Saunders, but wait till either of the gentlemen proposes to you, and you will accept."

"They have both proposed, and both been refused within the past twenty-four hours. There now! what do you think of that? Haven't I just a little bit of spirit and independence?"

"Why, May Saunders, you are a silly girl to refuse either of these gentlemen. You have made the first great mistake of your life. Reconsider what you have done, and accept one or the other of them."

"I will do no such thing. I'll live and die an old maid before I marry either of them, or any other man, for the matter of that."

"We will both live long enough to see things come out differently."

"Oh, I hope we will both live to a ripe old age, but in the end you will find that I have kept my word."

This bit of dialogue took place between my intimate friend, May Saunders, and myself on her twenty-fourth birthday, and I had been rallying her because she only had one more milestone to pass until she entered the domain of old maiddom—if allowance be made for coining the word—and I had been advising her to marry before she crossed the borderland.

John Brant was bookkeeper, and Harry Rogers was cashier in the bank of Iveson & Co., and both were excellent young men. I knew that both were devoted admirers of May, but I was greatly surprised to learn that they both had proposed, and still more dismayed to learn that both had been rejected.

"Tell me, May," I said, "what objection could you have to Harry Rogers? He is an exceptionally splendid young man, and no one stands higher in the public esteem in the whole town of Dayton."

"I presume," she replied, "that I dislike him because everyone praises him. He is unselfish, I grant it, and gentle and courteous, and all that, but to my mind he lacks self-assertion, without which no man's manhood is complete or perfect."

"Well, that charge does not lie against John Brant. He has self-assertion enough for any one man—a little more, in fact, than I admire, but perhaps not too much to suit your taste and fancy."

"John Brant is well enough so far as that goes," May rejoined, "and I do not mind telling you that I like him infinitely better than I do Harry Rogers, but not well enough to link my fate with his."

"And why not?"

"I can hardly tell. There is something about him that I cannot comprehend—something that is unfathomable, and a secret monitor whispers to me never to marry him, even if I should fall in love with him, which seems not only absurd but impossible."

I was quite overcome with the peculiar situation of affairs, and saw that it would be a waste of time to volunteer any sort of advice or undertake a solution of the knotty problem. So I concluded to leave the solution to the deft fingers of Time.

Both the young gentlemen continued to pay their usual attentions to May. The gossips of the town were in ignorance of the fact that both had already been rejected, and consequently there was nothing to interfere with their speculations as to which would win her in the end.

I watched my friend narrowly, and from time to time cautiously sounded her feelings, and made up my mind that it was only a question of time, until Miss May Saunders would be Mrs. John Brant. Her partiality was sufficiently marked to show the drift of the tide.

From John Brant I was able to learn that he regarded Harry Rogers as a rival—and a rival whom he both feared and hated, notwithstanding their close business relations.

But I was entirely unable to discover that Harry Rogers looked upon Brant as a rival in any sense of the word.

On several occasions he confided in me far enough to express both his amazement and pain that May should so persistently reject his love without giving him any reasonable explanation.

"Perhaps she thinks you lack self-assertion," I said to him, in the way of suggestion.

"That is what she told me herself, but I cannot understand it. I don't know what she means by it. I attend to my business and don't meddle with other people's. There has never yet been an occasion when it was necessary for me to set up my opinion in opposition to my business superiors. I do not know whether I would have the proper amount of self-assertion to do so successfully, but I certainly would stand by my convictions of right."

There was a commotion one day in the banking-house of Iveson & Co. When the doors were closed in the afternoon and the cash was balanced, Cashier Rogers was found to be just five hundred pounds short.

Every transaction of the day was gone over, the members of the firm taking a part in the work, but there was no way of accounting for the deficit.

The payments made during the day were few in number, and Harry Rogers was able to remember the whole list, and before night he had called on each of them, hoping to discover that he had made an overpayment to the amount of his deficit in one of them. But he had not.

At last it was concluded that a thief had snatched a package of bills when the cashier was not looking.

But Harry mentally refused to assent to any such an idea, although he could give no sort of an explanation for the disappearance of the money. He was cautioned to be more circumspect in the future, and all the bank employes were enjoined not to speak of the occurrence.

Harry Rogers was able to definitely settle one point—that the missing money consisted of five one hundred pound notes, and the chief of police was informed of the matter and instructed to keep a quiet look-out, through the detectives, for the appearance of such large notes in the hands of suspicious persons.

While Harry Rogers was at home that evening vainly trying to find some tenable theory about the stolen funds, John Brant was spending the time with May Saunders, and finally told her of the mysterious loss.

"But how did it escape getting into the evening papers?" enquired May.

"Oh, it's a great secret, and isn't to be spoken of outside the bank," was Brant's reply.

"Well, then, you are an excellent hand to keep a secret, Mr. Brant, I must say."

John Brant winced under this retort.

"How do you account for the loss of the money, Mr. Brant?"

"I don't account for it. There is only one man who can."

"Who is that?"

"Harry Rogers, the cashier. The money was in his custody, and he ought to know what became of it."

"John Brant, what do you mean?"

"Well, nothing; only that Harry Rogers ought to know what became of the money in his charge."

"I think I can fathom your meaning, Mr. Brant, and it is ungenerous, if not unjust, and without good grounds."

There was something in May's voice which suggested to Brant that it was the part of discretion to drop the subject, and he quickly invented an excuse for saying good-evening.

After he was gone May noticed that a letter had dropped from his overcoat-pocket in the hall. The business envelope was addressed to "John Brant, care of Iveson & Co.," and its contents evidently related to business affairs.

If May had any curiosity, she was too wellbred to examine the letter, and threw it into her work-basket and covered it from sight, until its rightful owner should call again.

"I believe he is ungenerous enough to charge the theft to Harry Rogers," May said to herself half aloud, after she had placed the letter out of sight. "But I am sure Harry Rogers is above any such base suspicion."

This was the first time she had ever heard a reflection cast upon Harry Rogers, and she instinctively became his advocate and defender.

Two weeks passed, and there was no clue to the theft, but one day another similar amount was missing from the cashier's funds.

Again there was an anxious investigation with no result. At its conclusion, Mr. Iveson said:

"This is inexplicable, Mr. Rogers. You are responsible for the funds placed in your hands, and we shall expect you to make the bank whole for the losses already sustained. When the bank opens to-morrow you will be expected to make good the losses, and then it will be decided whether you will longer continue as cashier."

"And if I fail to make good the loss?" asked Mr. Rogers.

"Publicity will be given to the affair, and the law will take its course. But until to-morrow not a word is to be spoken of this matter outside the bank."

Harry Rogers went home agitated and mystified. He knew he was innocent of wrong-doing, but had to confess that all the circumstances were against him.

He was barely able to make good the thousand pounds loss, but to do so would be almost a confession that he had stolen the money.

John Brant found it convenient to call on May Saunders, and it was not long until he had told her of the second loss, of Mr. Iveson's suspicions, and the delicate position in which Harry Rogers had been placed.

She concealed her indignation, and dismissing him on a plea of indisposition, hastily dispatched a note to Harry Rogers by a servant, requesting him to call on her at once and without failure.

He obeyed, but the unexpected summons did not soothe or allay his agitation. May dispensed with all preliminaries and began

"On two different occasions within two weeks you have lost five hundred pounds from the funds in your charge in the bank."

"That is true, but how came you to know it? It was a bank secret."

"It does not matter how I found it out. And you are suspected of taking the money yourself."

"Hardly so hard as that."

"It may not be put in just my words, but that is the meaning of it. You are required to make good the loss to-morrow morning. What answer are you going to make to that demand of the bank?"

Harry Rogers didn't know how he would answer that demand until he looked into the depths of May's earnest blue eyes, and then he said with a firm and even voice:

"I shall tell them that I did not take the money, and, therefore, will not replace it."

"And then?" queried May with an eager voice.

"Then I will be arrested for theft and

"But you will not be convicted. You are innocent—I know that—and your innocence will be made to appear—how, it is hard to tell, but I am confident as to the result. I respect you because you assume the risk to vindicate your good name. I am interested in this matter. You are not aware of it, but one-half the Iveson interest in the bank belongs to me, and is held in the name of Iveson in accordance with my father's will until a certain event occurs, which possibly never may occur."

Harry Rogers went home bewildered. He had for years been one of May's employes without knowing it, and now he found in her a champion and a firm believer in his innocence.

When he visited the bank the next morning and, declaring his innocence of the suspicions against him, declined to make good the deficit, except on the judgment of a court, and to prevent his bondsmen from paying it. Mr. Iveson was shocked and angry, and finally told Rogers that he would have to institute criminal proceedings against him unless the loss was made good.

"Then I am ready to be taken into custody," was his reply. "The sooner we begin to sift this mystery, the sooner we will get to the bottom of it."

It was one of the greatest of Dayton sensations when the arrest of Harry Rogers was made public and the story told in the papers with half-a-dozen different versions.

The bank employed a detective to secure corroborative evidence of the young cashier's guilt, and although but little could be found, his prospects were dark indeed, for he found it impossible to throw any reasonable light on the mysterious disappearance of the two missing packages of money.

May concluded to employ a detective also, without letting any one know what she was doing. An officer was summoned from a neighboring city, and called at Miss Saunders' residence to get his instructions.

In the course of an hour's conversation May gave him a history of the affair, and how she came to learn of the loss of the money and the suspicions entertained against the cashier.

The detective, of course, soon discovered that both the bookkeeper and cashier were in love with the young lady who had called his services into requisition.

"So it was the bookkeeper that told you the secret in the first place?" enquired the detective.

"Yes."

"And what was the motive?"

"I haven't the remotest idea."

The detective accidently struck his foot against the work-basket, and overturned it. With an apology for his awkwardness he began to replace the contents.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Officer," exclaimed May, "there is a letter that Mr. Brant dropped on the night he told me of the first robbery, and I had forgotten to return it to him."

"Let me see it," said the detective.

He opened the letter and exclaimed:

"What's this? Why, here are the identical five one hundred pound notes stolen on the first occasion! And Mr. Bookkeeper dropped them. He wanted to drive his rival, the cashier, out of the field, and then marry Miss May Saunders. You needn't blush, nor you needn't deny it. Say nothing for the present."

The unknown detective called at the bank the next day and had a conversation with Mr. Iveson, and Bookkeeper Brant was called into the conference.

"Why did you never make enquiry for the five hundred pounds you dropped at the residence of Miss Saunders the evening after that sum mysteriously disappeared from Cashier Rogers's drawer?" enquired the detective.

Brant was thunderstruck.

"Tell us about it," demanded Mr. Iveson.

Brant made a full confession, the substance of which was that he abstracted the money while Rogers's attention was distracted, and did it for the sole purpose of ruining the cashier and winning Miss Saunders. He had intended to replace the money, and would do so now, if permitted to leave Dayton and never return.

To this Mr. Iveson and the other members of the firm consented, and that night John Brant disappeared, and has never been heard of in Dayton since.

Simultaneously with the detective's revelation and Brant's confession, the proceedings against Harry Rogers were discontinued, and he was not only restored to his place in the bank, but promised a partnership interest.

May Saunders, that used to be, is Mrs. Harry Rogers now, and the name of the banking-house is Iveson & Rogers. May insists that I am mistaken when I tell her that she once said she would live and die an old maid before she would marry Harry Rogers. Well, I will not argue the point with her.

Dr. J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne

THE ORIGINAL AND ONLY GENUINE.

ADVICE TO INVALIDS—If you wish to obtain quiet, refreshing sleep, free from headache, relief from pain and anguish to calm and assuage the weary achings of protracted disease, invigorate the nervous media, and regulate the circulating systems of the body, you will provide yourself with that marvellous remedy discovered by Dr. J. Collis Browne (late Army Medical Staff) to which he gave the name of CHLORODYNE, and which is admitted by the profession to be the most wonderful and valuable remedy ever discovered.

CHLORODYNE is the best remedy known for Coughs, Consumption, Bronchitis and Asthma

CHLORODYNE acts like a charm in Diarrhœa, and is the only specific in Cholera Dysentery.

CHLORODYNE effectually cuts short all attacks of Epilepsy, Hysteria, Palpitation, and Spasms.

CHLORODYNE is the only palliative in Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout Cancer, Toothache Meningitis, &c

From Symes & Co., Pharmaceutical Chemists, Medical Hall, Simla, January 5, 1880. To J. T. Davenport, Esq., 33 Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, London. Dear Sir,—We embrace this opportunity of congratulating you upon the wide-spread reputation this justly esteemed medicine, Dr. J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne, has earned for itself, not only in Hindostan, but all over the East. As a remedy of general utility we must question whether a better is imported into the country, and we shall be glad to hear of its finding a place in every Anglo-Indian home. The other brands, we are happy to say, are now relegated to the native bazaars, and judging from their sale, we fancy that their sojourn there will be but evanescent. We could multiply instances ad infinitum of the extraordinary efficacy of Dr. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne in Diarrhœa, and Dysentery, Spasms, Cramps, Neuralgia, the Vomiting of Pregnancy and as a general sedative, that have occurred under our personal observation during many years. In Cholera, Diarrhœa, and even in the more terrible forms of Cholera itself, we have witnessed its surprisingly controlling power. We have never used any other form of this medicine than Collis Browne's, from a firm conviction that is is decidedly the best, and also from a sense of duty we owe to the profession and the public, as we are of the opinion that the substitution of any other than Collis Browne's is a DELIBERATE BREACH OF FAITH ON THE PART OF THE CHEMIST TO PRESCRIBER AND PATIENT ALIKE We are, Sir, faithfully yours, Symes & Co. Members of the Pharmacy Society of Great Britain His Excellency the Viceroy's Chemists.

CAUTION.—Vice Chancellor Sir Page Wood stated that that Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE was undoubtedly the inventor of CHLORODYNE; that the story of the defendant Freeman was deliberately untrue, which, he regretted to say, had been sworn to.—See Times, July 13, 1864.

Sold in bottles at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d. 4s 6d., and 11s. each. None is genuine without the words "Dr J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne" on the Government Stamp. Overwhelming medical testimony accompanies each bottle.

CAUTION—Beware of Piracy and Imitation.

James Brayley, Hamilton, says "I read the testimonials for McGregor's Speedy Cure and found that I had not to go to New York, Philadelpeia, Louisiana or Texas to find living witnesses of its value; we have plenty of persons right here to prove its merits. I got a bottle and it helped me right away. I was as bad with Bilious Fever and Indigestion as I think any one could be. I have taken three bottles and am nearly well, and can eat any kind of food without it hurting me. I may say that I am better then ever I expected to be. Free trial bottles at A.P. Chown sole agent.

"Rough on Catarrh.
