WHICH ONE?

One of us, dear—
But one—
Will sit by a bed with a marvellous fear,
And clasp a hand
[illegible] upon some
Darling, which one?

One of us, dear—
But one—
Will stand by the other's coffin here
And look and weep
While three marble lips strange silence keep.
Darling, which one?

One of us, dear—
But one—
By an open grave will drop a tear,
And homeward go
The anguish of an unshared grief to know.
Darling, which one?

One of us, darling, it must be;
It may be you will slip from me
Or perhaps my life may just be done—
Which one?

LOVE A LA MODE.

BY LOUISA PARR.

"My dear Molly, how glad I am to see you! It does seem such an age since you were here, although we've nothing to amuse you, for do you know the Halketts have gone. Mrs. Halkett's grandfather must choose to be taken ill—tiresome old man. And not content with rushing off herself, she must needs drag her sister away—Celia Young. You remember I wrote about her; a charming girl! And here we are, left with nobody but Carrie and Hatty Wentworth. I don't know what you'll say.

"Say that I'm very glad they are gone, my dear Fanny. My only regret is that Miss Wentworth did not accompany them."

"Monty!" and the speaker shook her head regretfully. "Not that really any one need mind Hatty, for once that ridiculous notion of hers about Tom Carlington throwing her over, except to sit and abuse all the men, she might as well be dumb."

The gentleman addressed as Monty curled his lip disdainfully. He was evidently about to give vent to some cutting sarcasm, but apparently recollecting that the subject was not worth the trouble, he heaved instead a very profound sigh.

"I'm sure you would have liked Celia Young, Monty; and she was expecting to meet you."

"Thank heaven, then, for sending her a disappointment, Fanny. I see you don't believe me, but I give you my solemn word that I have done with women forever. One has managed to completely blight my life, to break my heart, and half kill me; and I think, if you ask me, that is about enough."

"Unfeeling, heartless girl," was murmured, sympathetically. "How you must despise her?"

"I! What, because I discover that she has been dealing falsely with me—trifling with me—do you suppose that I can cease to love her? On the contrary the hopelessness of her ever being mine but adds fuel to the fire and increases my torture. As long as I live I shall never cease to worship that girl—never!" and making a great display of a cambric pocket-handkerchief, embroidered with a most elaborate initial, the disconsolate lover sank back in the carriage as if thoroughly overcome by despair.

Fanny, otherwise Mrs. Stanhope Rodney, sighed audibly. Monty Curzon was her most petted cousin—one of the best-looking men about town, universally spoiled, and hitherto the greatest adept at a flirtation to be met with in the United Kingdom. For years he had carried everything before him, had raised hopes only to scatter them, wounded hearts which he left for others to spread salve over; had come, seen, and conquered; loved, laughed, and ridden away. All at once, fortune had refused him her favor, just when chance had thrown him in the way of more than his match in an arch deceiver, who was not only wily enough to lead him on, but she called "Dilly-dilly-duck" until she actually effected his capture, and then, with Captain Curzon at her feet, was never more surprised than to find that what she had meant as play he had taken as earnest. Naturally she had preferred him because he had seemed to prefer her; but setting aside her engagement to Mr. Moss Golding (which she thought everybody in the world knew of,) how was it possible to conceive that, after having been told fifty thousand times that Captain Curzon never meant anything beyond a flirtation, she was all at once to suppose he intended anything more with her. Captain Curzon's friends said that Miss Lyster had behaved abominably; the strictures passed by the ladies were particularly severe. The men took a more lenient view of the matter; some were even heard to say that he had been only paid back as he deserved to be. However, as it seemed to be insisted upon, Captain Curzon was regarded as heart-broken, and this forsaking town and burying himself in the country was a certain proof of his suffering and his despair.

The short drive from the station accomplished, and Captain Curzon put in possession of the coziest of bachelor apartments, Mrs. Rodney hastened to the boudoir, where she found her sister Carrie—a kindly, middle-aged spinster—and Hatty Wentworth seated together.

"Well, he's come," she said, excitedly, "I've brought him back with me, but oh, so altered! You'd hardly know him for the same."

"There was room for improvement, wasn't there?" said Miss Hatty, ironically.

Mrs. Rodney treated the question with becoming contempt.

"You have never yet met Monty Curzon, Hatty," she said, crushingly.

"Oh, yes, I have, though; only I was never enough talked of to make it worth while for him to want an introduction to me."

"My dear, don't be spiteful! Besides, in the present case, it is really most unfeeling in you. The poor fellow is crushed—absolutely heart-broken."

Miss Wentworth laughed derisively.

"Really, Fanny, it is too absurd of you! Heart broken! As if any man had a heart to break. The whole of them are altogether made of cast iron."

"As I've told you before, Hatty," Mrs. Rodney delivered herself sententiously, "it is a pity to judge all by one bad specimen. However, you're certain to alter your opinion before long, for I suppose you don't mean to be a spinster forever."

"Heaven forbid!" cried Miss Hatty, tragically. "My only regret is that I can only marry one man. I should like to have the tormenting of thousands for all I am being made to suffer." And having delivered herself of this exalted sentiment of humanity, without waiting for a reproof, which she foresaw was in store for her, the young lady beat a hasty retreat from the room.

"Oh, dear, dear! What a pity it is that girl makes herself so silly," exclaimed Mrs. Rodney, irritably. "I do wish that Stanhope hadn't persuaded me to ask her here. I'm sure it was very ill-judged, Carrie."

Miss Wentworth, a cousin on Mr. Rodney's side of the family, was a pretty girl with a great share of attractive power which had never failed her except in the instance of Mr. Tom Carlingford, who, having been played fast and loose with by her for an indefinite time, had at length grown restive and escaped this tyranny by removing his allegiance from her and placing it and his hand and fortune at the disposal of a simple and unattractive country girl, thereby, according to Hatty's showing, wrecking her peace of mind forever and setting her at variance with all mankind.

"I do hope she won't make herself disagreeable to Monty," said Mrs. Rodney, continuing to address her sister.

"Not at all likely, unless he interferes with her."

"Which he is quite certain not to do, he knows too much of her already, and the way she has behaved to dozens of men, especially to Roger Cotton. I believe he quite dislikes her; he told me some time ago that she was everywhere the character of flirting most abominable."

"Then I can quite understand the grounds for your apprehension."

"How? Why?"

"Simply because two of a trade seldom agree."

In the drawing-room the lowering of the brow over eyes which did not deign to look at him was the only acknowledgment Miss Wentworth vouchsafed in return for the unnecessarily profound bow made by Captain Curzon to her. That it might be perfectly understood that no further intimacy was desired, the young lady, lest to put in an appearance, crossed outside the circle made round the fire, and drew over a chair close to the window, at which she sat looking out until the announcement of dinner.

"I gave myself to you, Monty," said Mrs. Rodney, rising.

"Come along, Carrie," said the host, cheerily. "Hatty will have to bring up the rear."

Miss Wentworth rose so slowly, and trailed herself after them so languidly, that on reaching the door of the dining-room she perceived the party already seated, with a chair left vacant for her—it was placed opposite to Captain Curzon.

"I wish somebody was here to take a bet that he'll eat a capital dinner," she said, inwardly; "it would be something new to see a man's appetite affected by anything but his love. I'll just watch him."

And when Captain Curzon, who was really very well disposed toward the excellently arranged menu set before him, having finished his soup, looked up from it, his eyes were met by a pair which seemed to promise their owner some amusement in taking note of him.

"Confound that girl," he thought. "I wonder whether she means to sit staring at me all through dinner?" and in order to avoid her he bended the cream to Mrs. Rodney.

"I hope you've brought down a little appetite with you, Monty," she said simpleingly.

"Oh, but certainly I have. To-day I intend to make an extra good dinner, for I have not had much beyond a cup of coffee since yesterday."

Mrs. Rodney shook her head to show how deeply this announcement pained her.

"Isn't it at Malta where, to move your pity, they say that they haven't eaten anything for a week, or a fortnight?" The expression of Miss Wentworth's face as she asked this question was a study.

Captain Curzon, feeling the thrust, and hoping to give it back again, answered her quickly, that he had known the beggars there to say that they had been a month without food. What made Miss Wentworth think of the Maltese? Was she interested in anyone in Malta? The Sixtieth had gone from there.

The Sixtieth was the regiment of Roger Cotton. Miss Wentworth's old admirer, and the young lady—reported to have treated him very badly—perfectly understood the allusion.

"Oh, are they?" she said, feigning great interest in the matter. "Then the sea has put a further distance between England and your friend, Captain Cotton?"

"My friend? was he not yours also? I have heard him talk so very much about you."

"Really have you? I wonder now it I ought to feel flattered by what you tell me?"

And the eyes of the two speakers measured swords so openly that Mrs. Rodney, who alone had been listening to them, hastened to throw herself into the breach.

"Oh, come!" she said, "never mind now what anybody else said to anybody, let us talk of something more general. Stanhope, what are you saying to Carrie? When the party is small the conversation should go round the table."

"By all means, my dear. I was asking Carrie what could be Cohen's reason for not giving the old Jew (now Thorley's Food for Cattle) some give in your subject, and we'll choose between them."

But this arrangement not being satisfactory, Mrs. Rodney said they were not talking about anything at all. "So now let us start something fresh."

"Decidedly," said her husband. Whereupon a dead silence was maintained by every one, and when that at length was broken conversation was only kept up spasmodically.

Captain Curzon, deprived "of the enjoyment of his dinner," each dish of which was made bitter by the consciousness that Miss Wentworth was watching him, felt in a horribly bad temper. His host was disposed to condemn the fellow for not being as usual "good company." Soon after the ladies left the table the two gentlemen joined them.

"That's right, Hatty," said Mr. Rodney, seeing her go toward the piano, "sing us something, do."

Miss Wentworth had a charming voice which she was dying to make heard, and though the feigned reluctance she was anything but sorry that Stanhope had asked her.

"Hatty, I beg of you be careful what you sing," said Mrs. Rodney, in a whisper. "Of late Hatty's songs had been descriptive of the most harrowing agony. "I would not for the world have you sing one of those dreadfully pathetic things."

"Why?" said Miss Wentworth, audibly. Mrs. Rodney frowned ominously, and then with her eyes intimated the heart-broken Curzon.

"Oh, I understand," and while seeming to search her memory Hatty played a rather stirring prelude, and then burst into a popular comic song.

"I say, Hatty, (Mr. Rodney was laughing heartily,) what on earth made you sing that? I didn't think you could do anything but pile up the agony."

"Surely this style would be much better suited to Miss Wentworth," said Captain Curzon, maliciously.

"I feel duly grateful for such a flattering opinion," said the young lady, "quite unmerited to me, for I chose the song most of regard to somebody, to whom pathos is objectionable apparently."

"If I stay here any longer I shall say something rude to that girl," thought Captain Curzon, rising hastily. "Fanny," he said aloud, "the moon is shining gloriously; are you afraid to venture on a turn in the garden with me?"

"It was just what I was wishing to do," and with a look intended to annihilate Hatty, Mrs. Rodney and her cousin stepped out through the window.

Does not every one know how events always happen—that the thing you most wish to avoid is always certain to take place?

The next morning there lay Mrs. Rodney instructed with neuralgia, utterly unable to lift her head from the pillow, the result of that moonlight ramble last night; her husband off to the meet, not expected back until to-morrow; and Curzon, who really might have had some grain of sympathy in the matter, refusing to put off her visit to a sick relation because she had written to say she would come by an early train. Oh, well, what might not happen it was impossible to say! The bare idea of Monty Curzon and that Hatty Wentworth having to sit down to breakfast together—alone, with nobody else with them—redoubled poor Mrs. Rodney to utter despair. "I can't help it," she moaned; "Davis you must go down and tell Captain Curzon that just at present I am not able to raise my head from the pillow, and ask Miss Wentworth if she will oblige me by having her breakfast in her own room."

"But, ma'am," began Davis.

"Don't talk to me, I can't listen; go and give the message as I tell you."

DESERONTO CELEBRATION.

A Large Gathering of Orangemen—Three Bands and Sixteen Lodges in Procession.

The anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne passed off quietly here. At an early hour the crowds began to pour into the town. The steamer Deseronto, from Napanee, at 7 o'clock, was the first to arrive, followed by the Quinte, from Picton, bringing a goodly number, together with the 16th Battalion Band. The Napanee brass band, followed by the Napanee and Sohy Lodges, then made their appearance; then the steamers Varuna, from Trenton, and Prince Edward, from Belleville, the latter bringing the Prince Edward County Lodges, accompanied by the Ameliasburg brass band. The Deseronto brethren made great preparations for the event and went to considerable expense in building arches. Five magnificent arches were erected, decorated with mottoes, flags and bunting. Three of these were located on Main street. As soon as the different steamers had arrived the procession was formed (headed by Bro. F. P. Pettitt, D.M.) and proceeded to the Town Hall square, where they dispersed for dinner. At 1 o'clock sharp the procession re-formed and marched through the principal streets. The following is the order of the procession:

Bro. F. P. Pettitt, G.M.
Napanee Brass Band.
L.O.L. No. 524, Roblin.
L.O.L. No. 1244, Forest Mills.
L.O.L. No. 173, Demorestville.
L.O.L. No. 1113, Lime Lake.
L.O.L. No. 99, Mohawk, (Deseronto.)
L.O.L. No. 262, Shannonville.
L.O.L. No. 1220, Selby.
Ameliasburg Brass Band.
L.O.L. No. 80, Hallier.
L.O.L. No. 974, Ebenezer.
L.O.L. No. 1373, Deseronto.
16th Batt. Silver Cornet Band.
Prentice Boys, Belleville.
True Blues, Selby.
Prentice Boys, Lonsdale.
True Blues, Napanee.
True Blues, Belleville.
Orange Young Britons, Deseronto.
Orange Young Britons, Hackett.

It proceeded up Main to Third St., up Third to Dundas St., up Dundas to Mill St., down Mill to Main St., up Main to St. George St., along St. George to St. Thomas St., across St. Thomas to Third and Main Sts. and back to the Town Hall square, where addresses were delivered by prominent members of the Order.

Good order was maintained throughout the day. One young man became boisterous early in the morning but was taken and cared for by Chief Gunyon. The processionists as they were about to enter the large arch at the head of Main street were commanded to halt and were photographed by Mr. John Coleman. The proceedings were brought to a close about 5 o'clock, and we might say a more orderly crowd of Orangemen we have never met. The moonlight excursion by the popular steamer Quinte was well patronized, but the weather turned out wet and made it unpleasant, more especially for those who delight in tripping the light fantastic.
