A BASHFUL MAN.

My father was a farmer of small property, with no other learning than what my mother, being dead, said, I an only child, he determined to give me that advantage which he fancied would have made him happy—a learned education. I was, therefore, sent to the grammar school of G——, and from thence to Cambridge, with a view of qualifying me for holy orders. Here having but a small allowance from my father, and being naturally of a timid and bashful disposition, I had no opportunity of rubbing off that native awkwardness which was destined to cause me so much misery.

In my person I am tall and thin, with a fair complexion and light flaxen hair; but of such extreme susceptibility to shame, that on the smallest subject of confusion my blood all rushes into my cheeks, and I appear a perfect full-blown rose. The consciousness of this failing made me avoid society, and I became enamored of a college life. I had determined on living at the university and taking pupils, when some unexpected events greatly altered the posture of my affairs, namely, my father's death, and the arrival of an uncle from the East Indies.

This uncle I had seldom heard my father mention; and it was generally believed that he was long since dead, when he arrived in England only a week too late to close his brother's eyes. I confess (what I believe has been often experienced by those whose education has been better than that of their parents) that my father's ignorance and vulgar manners had often made me blush to think I was his son; and at his death I was not inconsolable for the loss of that which I was not unfrequently ashamed to own. My uncle, too, was but little affected, for he had been separated from his brother for more than thirty years, and in that time he had acquired a fortune of £30,000, and upon this he built his hopes of never-ending happiness.

But while he was planning schemes of greatness and delight, whether the change of climate affected him, or what other cause I know not, he was snatched from all his dreams of joy by a short illness, of which he died, leaving me heir to all his property. Thus was I at the age of 25, possessed of an ample fortune, and well stocked with Latin, Greek and mathematics. But these advantages were more than counterbalanced by my awkward habits, and by my total ignorance of the usages of refined society.

I now purchased a fine estate in a fashionable district, and my company was much courted by those of my neighbors who possessed marriageable daughters. From these gentlemen I received familiar calls and the pressing invitations; and, though I wished to accept their proffered friendship, I repeatedly excused myself under the pretense of not being quite settled; for the truth is that when I had sallied out, either on horseback or on foot, with the full intention of returning their several visits my heart had failed me as I approached their gates, and, I have frequently returned homeward, resolving to try again to-morrow.

However, I at length determined to conquer my timidity, and accepted an invitation to dine on a certain day with one whose open, easy manner left me no room to doubt a cordial welcome. Sir Thomas Burton, who resides about two miles distant, is a baronet, with an estate of about £2,000 a year, joining to that I purchased. He has two sons and five daughters, all grown up and living with their mother, and a maiden sister of Sir Thomas', at Burton Hall, dependent on their father.

Conscious of my unpolished gait, I had been for some time past taking private lessons from a professor who teaches grown gentlemen to dance; and, although I at first found wondrous difficulty in the art he taught, my knowledge of mathematics was of prodigious use in teaching me the equilibrium of my body, and the due adjustment of the centre of gravity to the five positions.

Having now acquired the art of walking without tottering, and learned how to make a bow, I boldly ventured to accept the Baronet's kind invitation to a family dinner, not doubting that my new acquirements would enable me to see the ladies with tolerable intrepidity.

As I approached the house the dinner bell alarmed my fears lest I had spoiled the dinner by want of punctuality. Impressed with this idea, I blushed the deepest crimson, as my name was repeatedly announced by the servants who ushered me into the library, scarcely knowing what or whom I saw. At my entrance I summoned all my fortitude, and made my new learned bow to Lady Burton; but, unfortunately bringing back my left foot to the third position, I trod upon the gouty toe of poor Sir Thomas, who had followed close to my heels to be the nomenclator of the family. The confusion this occasioned to me is hardly to be conceived, since none but bashful men can judge of my distress, and of that description, the number, I believe, is very small, indeed. The Baronet's politeness by degrees dissipated my concern; and the cheerfulness of her Ladyship, joined to the familiar chat of the young ladies and their brothers, insensibly led me to throw off my reserve and sheepishness, till at lenth I ventured to join in conversation, and even to start fresh subjects.

The library in which we were seated, being richly furnished with books in elegant bindings, I conceived that Sir Thomas was a man devoted to literature, and ventured to give my opinion respecting the several editions of the Greek classics, in which Sir Thomas's ideas entirely coincided with my own. While talking on the subject, my attention was directed to an edition of Xenophon, in sixteen volumes, which, as I had never heard of such a thing, greatly excited my curiosity, and I rose up to examine what it could be. The Baronet saw what I was about, and, as I supposed, willing to save me the trouble, rose to take down the volumes, which made me more eager to prevent him, and hastily laying my hand on the first volume, I pulled it forcibly; but, lo! instead of books, a board, which by the bookbinder's art had been made to look like sixteen volumes, came tumbling down, and unluckily pitched upon an inkstand on the table under it. In vain did Sir Thomas assure me there was no harm; I saw the ink streaming from a beautiful inlaid table on to the splendid Turkey carpet, and, scarce knowing what I did attempted to stop its progress with my white pocket handkerchief. In the height of this confusion we were informed that dinner was served up; and I, with joy, then understood that the bell which at first had so alarmed my fears was only the half-hour dinner bell.

In walking through the hall and suite of apartments to the dining room, I had time partially to collect my scattered senses, and was desired to take my seat between Lady Burton and her eldest daughter at the table. Since the fall of the wooden Xenophon, my face had been continually burning like a fire-brand, and I was just beginning to recover myself, and to feel comfortably cool, when an unlooked for accident rekindled all my heat and blushes.

Having set my plate of soup too near the edge of the table, in bowing to Miss Dinah, who politely complimented me on the pattern of my waistcoat, I discharged the whole scalding contents into my lap. In spite of an immediate supply of napkins to wipe my clothes, my pants were not stout enough to save me from the painful effects of this sudden fomentation, and for some minutes my legs and thighs seemed stewed in a boiling cauldron. At last, when the pain began to abate, I managed to bear it in silence, and sat with my lower extremities par-boiled, amid the stifled giggling of the servants.

I will not inflict upon my readers a relation of all the blunders which I made during the first course, by spilling a sauce boat, upsetting a salt-cellar, etc., rather let me hasten to the second course, when fresh disasters quite overwhelmed me.

I had a piece of rich, sweet pudding on my fork, when Miss Louisa Burton begged [illegible] did, I whipped this hot pudding into my mouth. It was impossible to conceal my agony; my eyes were starting from their sockets. At jack in spite of shame and resolution, I was compelled to drop the cause of torment on my plate. Sir Thomas, his sons and the ladies all compassionated my misfortune, and each advised a different application.

One recommended oil, another water, but all agreed that wine was the best for drawing out the heat, and a glass of sherry was ordered me. The glass was eagerly seized by me; but oh! how I tell the sequel? Whether the butler by accident mistook, or purposely designed, to drive me mad, he gave me pale brandy, with which I filled my mouth, already flayed and blistered. Totally unused to every kind of ardent spirit, with my tongue, throat and palate as raw as beef, what could I do? I could not swallow, and clapping my hands upon my mouth, the liquor squirted through my nose and fingers like a fountain over all the dishes, and I was crushed by bursts of laughter from all quarters.

In vain did Sir Thomas reprimand his sons and the servants, in vain did Lady Burton chide her daughter; for the measure of my shame and their diversion was not yet complete. To relieve me from the intolerable state of perspiration which this accident had caused, without consideration, I wiped my face with that ill-fated handkerchief, which was still wet from the consequences of the fall of Xenophon, and covered all my features with inky streams in all directions. The Baronet himself could not support this shock, but joined his lady in the general laugh, while I, springing from the table in despair, rushed out of the house and ran home in an agony of confusion and disgrace, which the most poignant sense of guilt could not have excited.
