THE POISONED CUP

After rich Frank Manning married Elsie Graham in a fit of pique and jealousy, Margaret Preston, once his betrothed wife, suffered more than words can tell.

She nearly went mad with rage and pride and wounded passion, but she had sense enough to hide her heart from envious eyes.

And whenever she again became mistress of herself she called upon the bride, and Mrs. Manning who knew nothing of the old love story welcomed her heartily, and told Frank on his return home that she was delighted with his old friend, Miss Preston.

"She cannot have cared for me," thought Frank Manning, with a pang to husband should have felt at such a thought, but the little wife never guessed it, and it did not harm her.

She returned the young lady's call and an intimacy began at once.

So that when the Mannings went to their place in the country for the summer season Elsie sent a warm invitation to Miss Preston.

Margaret thought it over.

It was an offer not to be despised by a fashionable girl with a small income.

She desired to marry, and hotels at watering places were expensive.

All the men of their set would be at Frank Manning's at one time or another.

The neighbouring residents were people of position.

She could dress and flirt to her heart's content, and Frank would see what a prize he had lost, even while she gave him plainly to understand that she was glad to have escaped the matrimonial yoke.

And then she wrote a loving note to Elsie, and held an interview with her dressmaker.

And Frank Manning—well, he had loved this girl, and had married Elsie because she had made him angry.

And Elsie was so sweet and mild and gentle.

And now he was waiting for her coming with a guilty feeling at his heart.

He wanted to see her, to sit by her, to hear her sing. As her host he could do this, at least.

He went to the depot to drive her home.

Elsie had of course expected him to do that, but see had not expected what followed; for when they were in the little wagonette side by side, and she turned and looked into his eyes, Frank Manning had kissed the girl.

It was night, and though the moon was bright the shady lanes which led to the park were still and lonely.

No human eye looked down upon them, and their lips had met so often—oh, so often!—before.

But Margaret drew back and flushed scarlet, and said:

"You forget you are a married man, sir."

And Frank answered:

"Yes, I did forget. Pardon me."

Then there was silence.

She hoped that he might be regretful of the past but had not dreamt that he would dare presume upon it.

For an hour or so after—the evening was over—the long dinner, the music in the parlor, the talk, the walk in the moonlight, with the young wife's arm about her waist, Margaret intended to make her visit very brief.

In a little while, however, she changed her mind.

She would stay; and this wife, who boasted to her husband's love, should suffer a little also.

And now all that was evil asserted itself in Margaret Preston's heart, and where evil once abides it grows stronger day by day.

She laughed, she flirted, she danced with other men, but she met Frank alone by the banks of the river.

She sang duets with this one, looked merrily into the eyes of that, but in the lonely woods she sat by Frank's side with his arm about her waist.

They talked freely of the past now.

He had confessed that she was yet more to him than any other woman; more than his trusting, unsuspicious wife.

Only that little life stood between them, and often as Margaret looked at Elsie, she felt that she should be glad to see her in her coffin.

Yet the end of her visit approached.

She must go, since she could have no excuse for lingering, and in her absence might not the wife win the heart of one who already respected and admired her, though his passion was another's?

Surely.

So with the fiend's whisper in her ears, Margaret Preston walked out alone, making the purchase of some little trifle in the village an excuse for a solitary hour.

For a while she battled with her hate for Elsie, knowing her to have none but friendly feelings to herself, but it overpowered her at last.

Then suddenly—surely Satan was whispering in her ears—she remembered that she had heard of a drug, which, though almost an instantaneous poison, left little trace, and was tasteless.

For a moment she was troubled, and flung the suggestion from her; but Satan is strong.

There was a drug store in the village, and the proprietor had left a young, empty-pated clerk in charge.

The poison which would not have been sold by the older man to any stranger without a doctor's prescription was dealt out without a thought by this boy, and Margaret went home with the tiny packet hidden in her bosom.

Elsie was watching for her coming from the verandah.

She came forward to meet her guest with a smile.

"The others have had lunch," said she, "but I waited for you. I have had our little table set in the bow-window, with the view of the river. We shall have such a cosy time."

Then she led the way to the dining room, Margaret following and tossing her hat and mantle on the sofa.

The young hostess poured the coffee and handed a cup to her guest, taking one for herself.

At that moment some one called from the hall:

"Come, both of you. Something to see."

It was only a great pleasure barge going up the river with a picnic party.

Elsie left the table and ran into the room.

Margaret delayed an instant before she followed.

In that little space of time she had emptied the poison into poor Elsie's cup of coffee, and thrust the crumpled paper that had held it back into her bosom.

Elsie returned first.

As she seated herself she happened to notice that the cup she had passed to Margaret was overfilled.

It looked untidy; neither had yet been tasted.

And with the natural impulse of a careful hostess Elsie changed the cups.

Little did she guess what she was doing.

She only desired to set before her guest that which was neatness.

And little did Margaret know what had happened in that brief instant.

She looked to see her rival turn pale.

She watched for some token that the poison had begun work.

Instead she herself felt a strange faintness creeping over her, was conscious of a sudden agony.

The fate she had decreed for the innocent young wife was to be her own, and it came so swiftly to leave much time for thought.

Before the man who had ridden fast and furiously across the country to find the nearest doctor had performed his errand all was over.

Dying Margaret Preston understood only that in some way Providence had outwitted her.

"Pray for me," she whispered to Elsie. "I dare not pray for myself."

And with her hands held fast between Elsie's hands, with Elsie's tears falling fast upon her pillow, Margaret died.

They found the crumpled paper with poison written on it in her bosom.

The coroner's jury gave a verdict of suicide, and remorse filled Frank Manning's heart, for, he believed that Margaret Preston had killed herself because she could not live without him.

In his trouble he made a sort of confession to his wife.

No man ever made a full and true one under such circumstances.

What Elsie gathered from it was that her own attractions had made him forget those of Margaret Preston, and that the poor girl could not endure the sight of their mutual tenderness; and so to this day she believes, and often goes with her husband to the churchyard where Margaret lies, and with her own fair hands plants flowers upon the grave of the woman who would fain have done her to death that she might win for her own the husband who, though not as true and perfect as Elsie believes him, now loves her very fondly; loves her, though he remembers with a pang the passionate creature who as he fancies died for love of him.

In this world the truth will never be known, and it is better that it should not be.

Fellow's Syrup of Hypophosphites saved the life of my wife, after her case became apparently hopeless from Tubercular Consumption.

INDISPENSABLE.—There are some simple remedies indispensable in every family. Among these, the experience of years assures us, should be accorded Perry Davis' PAIN-KILLER. For both internal and external application we have found it of great value; especially can we recommend it for colds, rheumatism, or fresh wounds and bruises.

DR. CARSON'S never claimed for his Stomach and Constipation Bitters any Miraculous Power of Healing, but with the quiet consciousness of their medicinal virtues he prescribes them to all those who suffer from any derangement of the Stomach, Bowels, Liver and Kidneys. In large 8 oz. bottles at 50c. For sale by all druggists.

Would Not be Without It.

One who has fairly tested Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, though prejudiced against proprietary medicines in general, writes: "I would not rest over night without this reliable remedy for sudden attacks of cholic, cramps and cholera morbus so prevalent in the summer season. I keep a bottle ready at hand.

A General Stampede.

Never was such a rush made for any drug store as is now at J. Geo. King's, Market Square, for a trial bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, coughs and colds. All persons afflicted with asthma, bronchitis, hoarseness, severe coughs, or any affection of the throat and lungs, can get a trial bottle of this great remedy free by calling at above drug store.

The Head and Stomach.

When the head aches, the stomach is almost invariably the cause. A single dose of HERRICK'S SUGAR COATED VEGETABLE PILLS will relieve the former through purifying the latter, and restoring its tone. These great cathartics are sold everywhere. They never fail! Try them.

The Best Cough Remedy

FROM MRS. ROBERT TURNER, of Unadilla, N. Y.

"I can say with the utmost confidence that I think DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY the best cough remedy I have ever known, and believe I owe my present existence to its wonderful curative powers, having at one time been brought very low by a distressing cough, accompanied with spitting of blood and other symptoms of that dread destroyer, consumption. I tried many remedies without effect, until a resort to the Balsam was had, which, by the blessing of Divine Providence, soon restored me to health. The Balsam is now our resort whenever any of our family is attacked with coughs or colds, and it has never failed to give the desired relief. I keep constantly a supply on hand. During the past ten years I have influenced many persons to make use of this remedy, and always with the same success."

50 cents and $1 a bottle. Sold by all druggists.
