Clocks Driven By Weights

(By W. F. POTTER)

Following the subject on water clocks in our last issue, we now come to clocks driven by weights.

So many contradictory records exist as to the invention of clocks composed of an essemblage of wheels, actuated by weights that any attempt to fix the exact date of their introduction would be mere guess work, but the first weight clock is credited to Gerbert about the year 990.

There are vague records of public clocks prior to the year 1335 but the earliest weight clock worthy of definition, of which there are authentic details is one said to have been invented in 1335 by a monk named, Peter Lightfoot and from that date public clocks passed on in various stages of improvement until the 15th century at which time they began to be common in private families, both in the European Continent and in England. About 1582 Galilio, the famous astronomer noticed the synchronous vibration of the lamp suspended by a long chain in the cathedral at Pisa and in later years, when blind he dictated to his son Vincent a method of using the pendulum, as a time keeper which the latter invented in 1641, but was not put into general use until 1649.

The first history of a striking clock seems to be unestablished, but prior to the year 1298, a clock at St. Paul's Cathederal struck the hours by means of mechanical figures. In accounts of the Cathedral for the year 1286, the allowance to Barthoms Orologaro, the clock keeper, are entered namely at the rate of one loaf of bread daily. This clock had no dial until the year entered into a contract with Oronger of Southwork to supply and erect a dial.

In about the year 1500 Peter Hele a clock maker of Nurembery invented the mainspring and from that date great advancement was made. This allowance of the making of portable clocks, the first of which were made in the year 1501.

In the next issue we embrace electric clocks, pneumatic clocks, and clocks driven by a fan or windmill and if space permits a brief account of the famous clocks of the world.

Remember when you used to blow on your fingers to make them warm?

GETTING WELL

At the best, getting well of tuberculosis is a long, tedious and expensive experience. The earlier the disease is diagnosed, the better chance there is for recovery in a shorter space of time. The severity of the disease and its extent when discovered determine, in a large measure, whether or not the patient will get well, the time it will take him to recover and how fit he will be after recovery. All of which leads to the conclusion that it is important to bring tuberculosis under treatment early.

Pneumonia, typhoid fever, measles and other acute diseases run their course; the patient usually recovers and although some permanent damage may result, the disease itself is ended. Tuberculosis is usually a chronic disease and even when the disease is said to be cured, but what should be designated as arrested, the tuberculosis will recur unless the patient takes proper care of himself. The idea is expressed in the phrase, "once tuberculosis always tuberculous," which means that once a person has had tuberculosis, care must be taken throughout life to avoid a return of the disease.

This is not a gloomy outlook. The arrested case who takes reasonable care of himself, above all avoiding fatigue and securing plenty of rest will, in all likelihood, outlive his friends who have never had tuberculosis and who do not pay attention to the health needs of their bodies. Illness teaches us the value of health and those who contract tuberculosis learn how to live a sane, healthy life for the maintenance and promotion of physical well-being.

The treatment of tuberculosis is built around rest, good food and fresh air. Of the three, rest is by far the most important. It is not to be expected that a diseased lung will heal without rest, any more than a broken bone will knit unless kept at rest by splints.

Perhaps the chief reason for sending patients to sanatorium for treatment is that they may learn how to rest. Sleep is rest, but no one can sleep all the time. The patient must, therefore, learn to rest in bed when awake, with the mind at peace and the body relaxed, and avoiding any unnecessary physical effort. As the condition improves, the patient is, by degrees, brought back to activities Throughout the remainder of his life adequate rest will be his dominant need.

"Not to be supplied from mills in Canada" is printed on orders for lumber issued in Japan. Japanese living in that great lumber province of British Columbia have been used better than that.

SKUNKS ARE NUMEROUS

Motorists who have occasion to use the country roads these nights report that skunks are unusually common this year. The principal reason for this is said to be due to the fact that the value of skunk skins has dropped so low that the animals are hardly worth trapping Motorists who have run over hese odiferous animals, besides other people who have had occasion to pass by the scene of the killing, will hope that the price goes up. While motoring during the past week The Herald editor has seen (and smelled) no less than three dead skunks on the highway.—Dundalk Herald.
