GOING TO GRASS

One day when all signs pointed to pleasant weather and when there was a lull in the general run of farm work plans were made for freeing five of the heifer calves that they might spend the summer on pasture. The acre of pig yard was inhabited by but a single sow and would provide an ample, a plentiful and convenient range. Along the lane fence a metal trough could be placed as a receptacle for pails of skim milk which twice daily would be added to the ration of grass.

It was decided that a herd of young calves released in the yard for the first time would defy all efforts at driving. Whether they chose to be stupid or playful, or both, they would be certain to try the patience of anyone So it was to be a leading process; at least they were to be connected to someone by ropes. And for me was reserved the privilege of five minor contests in "calfmanship".

In turn each youngster was petted or coerced until it wore an improvised halter hastily formed by slipping a rope with an "eye" end around the neck, then securing the harness by a loop through the "eye" of the rope and over the nose of the calf. Then began a series of towings, shovings and holdings occasioned by alternating and spasmodic starts and stops. It was a merry race the length of the barnyard and through two open gates, but the calves were not yet sufficiently heavy to cause real difficulties.

The responses of the five individuals were varied as in each case the noose was loosened from the nose of the calf to slip through the "eye" of the rope and leave the animal free. One would stand blankly gazing or would nibble a morsel of the knee-high pasture; another with head up and white-tipped tail flying free as a flag, would steer a course for the most distant corner of the sea of green. No difference marked the reaction of the twins which are somewhat younger and smaller than the other three.

An hour later all five were racing violently about their enclosure. Through the spaces between the currant bushes I watched them as I pressed moist earth about the roots of young cabbages being trasplanted into their final location in the garden.

"These calves will run their legs off," suggested mother from her point of vantage at the kitchen door. But the race was only begun for healthy youngsters set free in the month of June.

From my earliest days I recall the disposing of some wordy talker by telling him to "go to grass and eat clover." Truly most sage advice; and a much more pleasant climate has a grassy field than those infamous regions to which such persons are frequently assigned.

Suppose those who inflict upon the public ear boresome mouthings on sundry matters of no importance were put out on good wholesome pasture. What a practical, what an effective, and what a kindly treatment this would be-
