Safe at home

There is little doubt that illegal drug use is a scourge on any community.

Criminal drug activity is often the vortex of which many other crimes spin off—such as theft, robbery and assault. Therefore it makes sense for police services to direct added attention towards combating illegal drug use.

According to Halton Police Chief Stephen Tanner, the local police service has increased resources directed at drug enforcement which may be helping to drive down other crimes.

Tanner made the observation in the wake of the release of Statistics Canada's 2012 Crime Severity Index which indicated that Halton Region is the safest of 49 Canadian communities surveyed with populations of more than 100,000.

The survey indicated Halton had:

- The lowest overall Crime Severity Index (28.59 in 2012, down from 33.6 in 2011 and 37.0 in 2010)
- The lowest Violent Crime Severity Index (23.59 in 2012, compared to 28.2 in 2011 and 28.0 in 2010)
- The lowest Non-Violent Crime Severity Index (30.36 in 2012, down from 35.7 in 2011 and 40 in 2010)

Canada, as a whole, has seen a decrease in its score from 77.6 in 2011 to 75 in 2012.

Tanner indicated other factors may be at play in Halton such as an aging population and more visible police presence but we agree with police board member Rob Burton that increased drug enforcement is paying off in a "better community".

Stats Canada's numbers seem to back up that claim.

Emissions testing is 'ridiculous'

Dear editor,

I think the new emissions testing is a complete joke. First of all, if it is an emissions test, shouldn't someone be testing what pollutants are actually coming out of the vehicle and not a computer?

Isn't the point of a test whether you pass or fail? We had our vehicle tested to be told that it did not fail. However, we needed to bring it back (and be charged more money) to be re-tested because not all the indicators came up as ready. Each time we had to bring it back we would be charged another $30. This truly is a good money-making scheme.

If the government is going to have emissions testing, it should be testing vehicles, not a computer.

If we, as Canadians, don't let them know this is a ridiculous system they will continue to take our money for nothing.

Beware of coyotes

Dear editor,

I'd like to remind dog lovers, who continue to let their dogs off the leash in the Hungry Hollow ravine trails, that they are not only breaking a Town bylaw but also putting their dogs in danger, especially small dogs and puppies.

My house backs onto the trail and recently, in broad daylight, a large coyote came right up to our house. This is not the first time I've seen coyotes in my garden and hearing them howl at night, I'd say there is quite a large pack.

The numerous cats that have been visiting my garden in the last while have dwindled to one—another reason why residents with cats living close to the ravine area should consider their cats' safety and keep them indoors.

Fluids can be fatal

Dear editor,

Recently I had to put our cat down because he had been poisoned by engine coolant.

We would just like to make residents aware that someone has either been putting this out intentionally or maybe has a radiator leak. Approximately three years ago we had three of our cats suffer the same fate and because we didn't know what was happening to them it was too late by the time we took them to the vet and had to have them euthanized.

I know some people may get upset because we do let them outside but they are all fixed and have their shots. We have adopted/rescued many of our cats and the thought that someone may be intentionally doing this sickens me.

Make sure to keep any poisonous substances out of reach of any humans or animals and to check your vehicles for any leaking fluids that are not only hazardous to pets/wildlife but our environment as well.

Hope van Ravens, Georgetown
