Ford upgrades C-MAX Hybrid

Underscoring its commitment to fuel economy leadership, Ford Motor Company today said it is upgrading the 2014 Ford C-MAX Hybrid, which will go on sale in December.

The company also is changing the way it tests and labels the 2013 C-MAX Hybrid for fuel efficiency to better match performance and improve customer satisfaction.

The upgrades build on powertrain software updates Ford announced last month for the 2013

C-MAX Hybrid. The 2014 C-MAX also will benefit from several hardware changes, including:

- Gearing changes that result in a more efficient transmission drive ratio

- New hood seal, front and rear tire deflectors, A-pillar mouldings and the addition of rear lift gate deflectors to improve vehicle aerodynamics

- New engine oil with reduced friction

The enhancements to the 2014 C-MAX Hybrid are expected to improve customers' on-road fuel efficiency, especially at highway speeds.

In addition to improving the vehicle itself, Ford is changing the way it generates the L/100 km label for C-MAX Hybrid going forward.

Previously – and consistent with NRCAN'S Guidelines – testing of the Fusion Hybrid was used to generate fuel efficiency labels for a family of vehicles, including both Fusion Hybrid and C-MAX Hybrid.

The result was the same fuel efficiency label values for both vehicles.

Label changes for the 2013 C-MAX Hybrid will result in a higher combined fuel efficiency rating of 4.5L/100 km.

Because this voluntary step results in L/100 km values different from the original C-MAX Hybrid label, Ford also is making a goodwill payment to current C-MAX Hybrid owners for the estimated average fuel cost of the difference between the two labels.

Customers who purchased their vehicle will receive a cheque from Ford for $895. Customers who leased their vehicle will receive a cheque for $595.

As of July, Ford has sold approximately 1,000 C-MAX Hybrid vehicles in Canada.
