

The Camry (XLE model shown) for 2013 has few changes from the 2012 model that got a major overhaul. The main difference this year over last is the addition of features added as standard fare such as a rear view back-up camera.

Like fine wine, Toyota Camry gets better with age

The Toyota Camry just keeps getting better with age.

Now in its sixth generation, the Camry has long been one of the top-selling mid-size sedans in North America.

It had a major restyle in 2012 with a bolder design and improved handling so the 2013 model is relatively unchanged except for upgraded features like a standard back-up camera and a new "value package."

For 2013, the Camry is offered in a choice of seven models with three powertrain options and prices ranging from $23,700 to $34,275.

Our tester came in XLE trim with a 178 hp 2.5-litre four-cylinder engine and a six-speed automatic transmission, priced at $30,470.

This level has premium finishes like leather seating (heated in front), leather-wrapped steering wheel and shift knob, rear seat reading lamps and a push button smart key system. New this year on the XLE is a blind spot monitor and anti-theft system.

The base Camry for 2013 is the LE, starting at $23,700.

It features the same 2.5-litre four-cylinder engine and the choice of three upgrade packages including the new "value package" that includes 17-inch aluminum alloy wheels with all-season tires a power sliding moonroof and electro-chromic rearview mirror. This model is also available with a leather package and heated front seats.

Next up is the SE ($26,985) that adds 18-inch aluminum alloy wheels, a full skirt package, steering wheel-mounted paddle shifters, fog lamps and more. Leather and a moonroof package are the major options.

For those who want a bit more performance from their vehicle, the SE and XLE are also available with a 268 hp V6 engine. The SE V6 ($29,740) has an available premium package with an upgraded audio system, heated front seats and the blind spot monitor.
