Where Are The Armies?

During the war we were constantly reminded that certain armies of Britain were scattered over every part of the world. First and third in one place, eighth in another, and fourteen somewhere else. In between we know very little about the other armies. We may have had a hazy idea that an army was being maintained in India, another in South Africa, another in the south seas and others in various parts of the world wherever a little red patch appeared on he map. Now that the war is over, we would like to know just where these armies are. Canadians and Americans have been raising rumpuses demanding that they get back home. The British Tommy, however, carries on just the same. Only a day or two ago it was announced that British and Colonial troops were being moved into Japan so that Americans could go home. Ordinarily the British have always been regarded as a great sea power and their "contemptible little army" has been somewhat ignored. That same army today is scattered over all the world and they are still giving good service without complaint. When it comes to really disciplined fighting men, the British have the world beaten hands down. They are not great in numbers, but they can always deliver the goods. —Burks Falls Arrow.
