Bruce Trail hit hard by storm damage

The Bruce Trail took a beating in the recent ice storm.

"Work crews of volunteers, with trained chainsaw operators, have already started cleaning up the mess but it will take some time as in Halton Hills alone we have almost 100 km of main and side trails," said Maureen Smith, member of the Halton Hills chapter of the Bruce Trail Association.

Parts of the Trail are buried under tree trunks and branches and hard to locate. The route of the Trail is chosen to avoid hazards and wet areas where possible so leaving the Trail to get around these piles of debris can be dangerous.

Credit Valley Conservation and Halton Conservation have closed some of their areas to the public and that includes the Bruce Trail volunteers.

"As parts of the Trail go through these areas we are unable at this time to work until we receive clearance from the authorities. Please check their websites for further information", added Smith.

"We hope to have a good part of the main Trail cleared by the Spring and will issue updates when possible. Scotsdale Farm was particularly hard hit and will take some time to clear," said Smith. "If using the Trail please take care and watch for hanging branches that may fall at any time."
