SCHOOL BELL CONCERT.—The entertainment held at S. S. 17, con. 11 Euphrasia, on the evening of the 4th was a decided success. There were recitations, singing, speechifying and refreshments galore. A splendid program was ably rendered and a highly enjoyable evening spent. Reeve Gilray presided. The proceeds go to the furnishing of a school bell.

FOUR GENERATIONS.—Mr. Joseph Hawken of the 11th of Euphrasia is a hale and hearty old gentleman highly respected by all who know him. He recently had a visit from his daughter, Mrs. Jas. Hugo, of Dundas, his granddaughter, Mrs. Jas McCormick and her husband of Arthur and three daughters. Thus four generations were represented. This is a rare circumstance.

RESPONSIBILITY for damages done by runaway horses was fixed at the Bracebridge Division Court last week. John Brown, of Gravenhurst, let his horse run away at Bracebridge, and they ran into Pat Sherund's team, killing one of his horses. Suit was brought to recover the value of the horse and judgement given in favor of Sherund for $86 and all the costs.

It is not generally known that at last session of the Legislature an act was past, which is now in force, providing that where the husband dies without a will with property less than $1000 everything goes to his widow. Where he dies with more than $1000 in the administration the widow will get $1000 anyway. Thus the widow will no longer be made to suffer through her husband's carlessness in not making a will.

A Happy Release.

On Saturday last Mrs. Stephens, widow of the late John Stephens, of the suburbs, passed away to her reward after a long and painful affliction. Deceased happened with an accident some three years ago while milking a cow, from which she was confined to her bed for several months, and during which time she suffered intensely. She, however, recovered sufficiently to go about with the aid of a staff. Six months ago a cancerous tumor began to develop in her side, and the old lady, now in her 73rd year, continued to grow worse until death came to her release as above. She bore here painful and prolonged illness with christian fortitude and passed home in the triumphs of faith. The funeral took place on Sunday to the Anglican cemetery, Rev. M. M. Goldberg, the rector, improving the occasion by an appropriate sermon from the following text of scripture of her own choosing: "I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better." She had also left a request that her six nephews act as pall bearers, viz: Mr. John Hill's three sons, Silas Ace and Will, Messrs Andrew Beattie, Joseph Dowsett and J. W. Whitby, which request was complied with. Notwithstanding the very inclement weather a large number were in attendance to pay a last tribute of respect to the departed.

A Trip Abroad.

Miss McFarland, daughter of our respected townsman, W. J. McFarland, Esq., has kindly consented to furnish a series of "notes by the way" on her recent trip to Europe and the continent. We are sure they will be perused with interest by our readers. The following is the third instalment.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Paris, which we reached from London by Southampton and Havre, has well been named "the beautiful." It is certainly almost perfect in architectural beauty. Its wide boulevards with their large shade trees, most artistically trained; its numerous public squares with their fountains and statuary; its splendid parks and gardens, with their cafes, their brilliant equipages and gaily-dressed promenaders; its business streets with their bright pretty shops. It is, in fact, the direct opposite to London with its uproar; its massive dingy buildings; its smoke and dust, and it seems quite refreshing to arrive in Paris. This may be accounted for by the fact that no manufactory, which creates smoke, is allowed within the city limits, hence the bright clean aspect of everything. Then, in addition to this precaution, some of the streets, which are mostly of asphalt, are scrubbed about three o'clock in the morning. The French are exceedingly polite and obliging, although as a rule they are a frivolous, pleasure-loving people, without the stability of character which marks the English or Germans, but with a natural ability for enjoying themselves and appearing happy and vivacious. A common sight in the streets of Paris is the bare-headed flower-girl, with her gay, pretty costume, and happy face, pushing ahead of her a cart full of flowers and fruits, and calling out in her musical language, the names and merits of her wares.

Paris at night, is a lovely sight, when the myriads of electric lights are lit. The bright cafes with their tables occupying half of the wide street; the squares alive with gaily-dressed pleasure-seekers; the parks beautifully illuminated everything to please the eye. It is safe to say that Paris is almost as wicked as it is beautiful. With the Parisians, Sunday seems to be regarded as a fete day. How thankful we Canadians should be, who have our day of rest; our peaceful "seventh day." The first place the ladies usually visit is the Bon Marche, one of the finest—if not the finest—stores in Paris. This place has been suitably (?) named "woman's paradise and man's purgatory."

The Place de la Concorde, which was near our hotel, is the finest place or square in Europe. In the centre of it stands the Obelisk of Luxor, the first to be brought from Egypt. It is on the site of this Obelisk the the gullotine stood, where two thousand people were beheaded, among the first being the lovely Queen Marie Antionette and her husband. Three times foreign armies have encamped on the Place de la Concorde. Near here is a bridge crossing the Seine, (Paris has seven bridges crossing the river) and made of stone from the Bastile. The Champs Elysees is a beautiful drive and promenade at one end of the Place de la Concorde. The statuary at the entrance was brought from Louis XIV's palace. The Champs Elysees is like Hyde Park in London, the fashionable drive of Paris, and here may be seen in the afternoon, splendid carriages, usually occupied by handsomely dressed ladies. In the evening it is even more brilliant, for on either side are brightly illuminated theatres and cafes.

Many of the churches are remarkable for their architecture, paintings or historic associations. Most impressive of all is the Cathedral of Notre Dame founded in 1113. Over the portals are a series of niches, containing statues of twenty French kings. In the center of the second story is a lovely rose-window, forty two feet in diameter. The wood-carving of the choir is especially worthy of notice. During the Revolution, this cathedral was used as a military depot. The Pantheon is another interesting church. Its foundation was laid by Louis XV in 1764. The frescoes here are very fine, especially the ones representing scenes in the life of Joan of Arc. This reminds me of the conundrum which is sometimes asked, namely, "What is the difference between Noah's Ark and Joan of Arc?" The answer, of course, is, one was "made of bark," and the other "Maid of Orleans." But, to return to the Pantheon. The dome of the Administration building at the World's Fair was modeled after the dome of the Pantheon. Among the latest additions to the vaults is the body of the late Sadi Carnot, the murdered President, by Caserio, at Lyons. The Pantheon was held by communists for two days in 1871 and Milliere, one of the leaders, was shot on the front steps. The Church of St. Surplice has the finest organ in Paris. It has six rows of keys, a hundred and eighteen stops and seven thousand pipes. An interesting and lovely spot to visit is the tomb of Napoleon I, in the Church of St. Louis. The great sarcophagus is made of porphyry and stands directly under the dome which crowns the edifice. The church of the Madeline, where we attended high mass one morning, stands on a massive raised platform, and is built in the shape of a Greek temple. It is especially notable for the memories which surround it. During the Reign of Terror three hundred communists were killed in front of the altar, where they had taken refuge.

The Arc de Triomphe, which stands on the Place de l'Etoile was begun by Napoleon I, for a monument to himself, but not completed until Louis Philippe's reign. It is the grandest extant structure of its kind. The inner walls are inscribed with the names of over three hundred generals and ninety six victories. Under this arch the remains of Victor Hugo lay in state for some time. From the Place de l'Etoile radiate ten broad avenues. One of these is the avenue Bois de Boulogne, which leads to the Park of that name. This park covers two thousand five hundred acres, and is outside the city. Its broad drives, mazy paths and shaded groves are the resort of all classes of Parisians. Within its boundaries also are artificial lakes, waterfalls, gardens, and two race-courses, where races are held nearly every Sunday.

The Citadel of Mount Valerien, one of the fortifications, with which Paris is surrounded, played a prominent part in the seige of 1871, and is the largest and strongest fort of Paris.

The Trocadero Palace, which, with its environments is the site of the Exposition of 1887, has a dome exceeding that of St. Pauls or St. Peters. A fine view is obtained from the top, which is reached by means of an immense elevator. The famous Eiffel Tower is exactly opposite the Trocadero and completely dwarfs every public building and spire that Paris contains. Its total height is nine hundred and eighty-five feet. At night there is a search-light on top and the different cafes, theatres, etc., in the Tower are illuminated. It is said that the Parisians built this tower in 1887 to get as near heaven as they could. For the Exposition of 1900 they are talking of digging a hole in the ground as far down as possible—seemingly to get as near the other place as possible.

The Palace and Museum of the Louvre is the most important public building in Paris. The origin of the name is thought to be derived from the word Louverie or wolf-resort, being on the site where once stood a hunting chateau of Philippe Augustus. In front is a balcony from which Catherine de Medici gave the sign to ring the bell for the massacre of the Protestants. The church is exactly opposite and is called Germain l'Auxerrois. The Galleries of the Louvre are exceedingly interesting, the statuary being particularly fine. The original Venus de Milo is here. It has both arms broken off and is much damaged, but even in its incompleteness, is a lovely figure. It was found at Milo by a peasant, and sold to the French Government for six thousand francs. It is impossible to tell of the masterpieces of the great artists such as Rubens, Raphael, Paul Veronese, Murillo, Titian, Lorraine and Greuze which adorn the walls.

The Gobelin Manufactory is the state establishment for the manufacture of carpets. The productions for generations have been reserved for the use of the Royal family or for presents to foreign courts, ambassadors or persons of distinction. Some of the larger pieces take years in construction and cost over ten thousand dollars in material and labor. The estimate of labor is one year for a square yard.

The Vendome Column is an imitation of Trajan's Column in Rome and was erected by order of Napoleon I to commemorate victories over the Russians and Austrians. It is a hundred and forty two feet high, and thirteen feet in diameter. The metal of which it is made was obtained by melting twelve hundred guns taken from the Russians and Austrians. On this square where the column stands, Napoleon I viewed his troops after the Italian war.

The cemetery of Pere la Chaise with eighteen thousand monuments, is the largest cemetery in the world, and here lie buried the noblest dead of France. The most interesting tomb is that of Abelard and Helois, whose tale of love and sorrow we are all acquainted with. After the lapse of seven centuries, fresh flowers placed there, show that the world still feels for their sorrows. Here too we saw the tomb of the money-king Rothschild. This cemetery was one of the strongholds of the Commune and among the tombs of the dead was waged one of the fiercest conflicts of the living.

One of the most fascinating places to visit is the Palace and Gardens of Versailles. As we walk through the old fashioned rooms with their rich tapestry, handsome furniture, treasures of art, etc., all betokening wealth, one almost looks for the haughty form of Napoleon to appear on the threshold or the graceful figure of the beautiful hapless Queen Marie Antionette, to glide along the wide corridor through which she used to pass to meet her husband, the King. But years have rolled away and with them came the changes, and now the lovely rooms and splendid halls, are silent and vacant, save for the memories with which they are crowded.

The Palace is best seen from the gardens, which are beautifully laid out with shady walks, statuary and fountains while from the front terrace is a most entrancing view of a lovely lake, in an equally lovely setting. In the left wing of the Palace is the hall where the Chamber of Deputies sat until 1880. The most impressive, and to many the most interesting places in the Palace are the private apartments of the unfortunate Marie Antionette, and the stair case by which he fled. In fact the Palace itself contains pages of history. Louis XIV died here, and we saw the bed upon which he breathed his last; also the window through which his death was announced to the people outside. Louis XV was born and died here. Louis XVI was forcibly carried away from here in 1789, and in 1815 it was pillaged by the Prussians. In 1855 the Queen of England was received here by Napoleon III. Sixteen years later it was occupied by German forces, and it was here that King Wm. of Prussia was proclaimed Emperor of Germany. The last king and queen to occupy the rooms were Louis XVI and Antoinette. We also saw the chapel in which these last named were married and worshipped. The state carriages of Napoleon Bonapart were of interest to all. The largest and most elaborate one, mostly of gilt, was used at his coronation. Another carriage is shown in which Napoleon rode to his marriage with Marie Louise, and in which the same poor child was taken home after being divorced. One in which our Queen rode is also shown.

We would like our readers to leave Paris, "the beautiful," as we did, with a picture in their minds of this lovely spot, with its memories of kings and queens, emperors and courtiers.
