Interesting News From Budapest, Hungary's Capital

A Characteristic Letter from Dr. Farmer with Facts and Incidents of Intense Interest

IS LIVING HIGH AT SMALL COST

Dr. Farmer's occasional letters from Florida, Bermuda and Scotland to the Free Press, have always been enjoyed by our readers. The following from Budapest, Hungary, where he is sojourning this winter with his daughter and her husband, the Hon. Mr. Wilson, United States Consul, will be perused with keenest interest:

Budapest, January 25, 1922

To the Editor of the Free Press:

This letter comes to you from the great and ancient Hungarian capital of a million people; beautiful in design and architecture, the equal of London and Paris in its broad massive-looking streets, imposing monuments and magnificent buildings, both public and private, but at present groaning under the loss of three-fourths of that rich adjacent territory that before the war paid tribute to Budapest as its proud and acknowledged metropolis.

I arrived here on Christmas eve, after a thirty-six hours run from Paris on the Orient Express, and a forced stay of two days in the French capital, getting my passport viised by the different Consuls of the countries through which I had to pass. The amount of red tape one has to submit to, to get these permissions, and the time and expenses involved, strike the traveller inexperienced in such matters, as not only ridiculous and unnecessary, but harsh and unjust in the extreme, a condition let us hope, that will cease to exist as soon as the nations get back from the irritations of war, to a common sense view of things.

I passed through the great cities of Munich and Vienna, and reached my destination, disturbed by nothing worse than the rather annoying frequency of such announcements by customs and railway officials as "La Frontiere, Messieur," and the carting out and back of luggage to be inspected, as we passed the borders between France and Germany, Germany and Austria, and Austria and Hungary. It happened to be daylight as I traversed Germany, and the fine rich appearance all through, both urban and rural, seemed to me to give the lie to that country's present plea of inability to meet its war reparation payments. I said to myself as I viewed it all, "If France had to pay to the uttermost farthing fifty years ago, even to the handing over to the enemy of two of her fairest provinces, surely there is nothing unjust or inequitable in her present demand that the loser this time, the author too, of no much bloodshed and ruin, and world-wide catastrophe, should be called on to foot the bill and pay up now."

What a wealth of subject matter there is to write about from this elegant old capital, wounded and scarred and starved as it still is from the recent awful punishment it has undergone at the hands of the relentless god of war! One hardly knows where to begin and where to end, and what may be the most interesting topics of discussion to his far-away readers at home. But let me in this letter simply dwell upon some marked and outstanding feature that presents itself here, and leave the rest for a future occasion.

To write about a place in the civilized world to-day, where one can get along cheaply—or even reasonably, in an age of expensive living everywhere, is something that I am sure will interest the most of us, and fortunately for me, that place, of all others I have sojourned in, seems to be here in Hungary's capital. That is one great recompense here, for all the loneliness an individual of active temperament like the writer, and fond of mingling with his followmen, finds to make up for lack of people of his own language to talk to, and get information from, and a daily morning paper to see what is going on around him and in the outside world.

Let me briefly give some of the figures current here, for the necessaries and comforts of life. A good suit of clothes costs nine dollars; a stylish looking pair of shoes two dollars; a five or six course dinner in the best hotels (and there are many palatial ones in Budapest) can be got for forty cents, and a good lunch in the ordinary restaurants for five or six cents of our money. A street car ride, with transfers all over this great city, costs ¾ of one cent, and they say the tram company is gaining money at that rate, which makes one doubt the sincerity of our street railway companies at home, who claim they lose money on five cent fares, and they have their labor troubles and strikes here too! Foot cards that I paid four cents for in Bermuda last winter, can be got here for less than half a cent. I attended the great Budapest horse market last week, known as the Hungarian Tatersalls, with a friend who is in the lumber business in the country some miles out from here. He secured a good seven-year-old horse for his team for forty dollars, and a pair of young, sturdy-looking French mules for about the same figure. Of course all these purchases are made in Hungarian money, but the prices I am quoting here are the Canadian equivalent.

One can hire a double carriage to go anywhere about the city for twenty cents, and a single rig for ten cents. I went to market one day with one of the servants of the house, and we got two nice chickens for thirty cents the pair, a large fresh fish, four or five pounds in weight, taken alive from among hundreds of others in a tank of running water (and the way they keep them alive right up to sale I must admit took my fancy), cost eighteen cents. We paid thirty cents for a fine big pheasant, and fifteen cents for a partridge, both of which game birds are plentiful about here and on sale all the time. Fresh eggs are fifteen cents a dozen.

One can spend half a day profitably here, in any one of the many fine municipal baths, where there are barbers, chiropodists, masseurs, etc., to wait on one, and the whole charge, including tips to all attendants, is covered by fifteen cents. The same may be said of the barber shops, which have all the latest appointments, and rank in elegance with our Toronto tonorial palaces. And I might go on and quote figures like these, all along the line of human requirements for comfort and good living. For instance seven dollars a month and their keep, is all that is paid to the man and wife who perform the duties of valet and cook in the mansion where I am stopping. What a refreshing change to one who has seen and felt the tyranny and insolence of domestic help at home! It will doubtless be asked, what is the reason for all this cheapness coupled with good value and efficiency, and while I have not perhaps been here long enough to study the problem sufficiently to give an accurate and scientific answer to these questions, I may venture to say this much, that while the value of the Hungarian crown has sunk from five in the dollar to seven hundred in the dollar, its purchasing power, though tremendously lessened, has fortunately for those who have to buy, not diminished in anything like the same proportion. As an example of the actual shrinkage, four years ago one got five street car rides here for a crown, now one pays five crowns for a ride.

But enough of prices and the cost of living in Hungary, I intended to touch here on the political situation, but as I find my letter already assuming bulky proportions, and do not wish to crowd out your space, I will postpone therefore, the discussion of other interesting things and of portentious events that are transpiring or expected soon to transpire here, for a future letter. That letter, I hope, will be penned from Bucharest, thirty-six hours' run from here, and the capital of Roumania, now a large and rich kingdom, by reason of its recent acquisition of Hungarian territory. This alien acquisition, the price of victory in warfare, Hungarians claim, was made against the wishes of the inhabitants of the territory just annexed. They also take pains to impress on the visitor that Roumania is too corrupt and too uncivilized a nation to hold or properly absorb its newly acquired territory for long, and that there is sure to be war again sooner or later over their beloved country's unjust despoliation. They take the position that Hungary did not want to fight, and should not be thus punished and stripped for having been dragged into the late war by Austria, whom she always hated. But impartial judges say again, that while she may have hated Austria, she hated Servia and Roumania more, and was only too ready for any excuse to attack her now victorious Balkan rivals.
