Dairy Barns Need Ventilation Two Fan System Proves Good

About 460 Halton county farmers have the production of milk as their basic occupation. Most of their dairy cattle are housed in conventional barns where the ventilation systems have not changed since the barn was built. Many dairymen are not aware of the reasonable cost of a modern ventilating system, although most are aware of the numerous advantages of good ventilation.

Under the conditions of temperature and humidity which are prevalent during the winter in Halton county, dairymen in the county should move about 180 cubic feet of air each minute for each cow which they have in the barn. Because the various dairy breeds vary in size and capacity, a more accurate rule has been formulated. It recommends the movement of 150 cubic feet of air per minute for each 1,000 lbs. of animal weight.

Because of varying weather conditions, all of this air does not need to be moved all the time. To accomplish a varying flow of air, a two fan system has been adopted by many Halton County farmers. With this system, a small fan moves about 50 to 60 cubic feet per minute for each thousand pounds of animal, while a larger fan moves the remaining 90 to 100 cubic feet when weather conditions make this necessary.

Under normal conditions, the small fan would be connected to a manual switch or a thermostat with a low temperature setting so that it would run most of the time. With a thermostat, the owner is assured that this fan will shut off if the temperature of the barn gets dangerously low.

The larger fan has a thermostat set at the desired barn temperature. It only runs when the building temperature is higher than desired and shuts off as soon as the building is cooled to the desired temperature. The small fan, of course, continues to run in an attempt to maintain the desired temperature.

Halton County dairymen who have this system, report a fresh healthy atmosphere with only a small variation in temperature throughout the day. Since the small fan is always running, there is always a gradual changeover of air so that the atmosphere stays relatively fresh.

The experience of Halton County's dairymen has indicated that special air inlets are not usually necessary. Sufficient air creeps in around doors, windows and feed holes to supply the fans. Usually propellor type fans are used because of their reasonable cost and good service.

Further information and advice on fan size and location can be obtained from the Extension Branch personnel at the Milton office of the Ontario Department of Agriculture.
