THE CHAMPION

MILTON, MAY 10, 1894.

A RUFFIAN KILLED.

Ingersoll has for years been cursed with a gang of young hoodlums, from 18 to 25 years of age, who have been in the habit of holding citizens up for small change, tripping them up with wires, &c., and pelting them with stones. On Friday night a number of the gang, the names of seven at least being known, finding that George Allward, a respectable young machinist employee, was escorting two girls to their home across the Thames, headed him off on his return and threw a number of large stones at him. One of the stones struck him in the side, another knocked off his hat, and when he stooped to recover the latter he laid his hand on the stone, a jagged one, about the size of a man's fist. Allward picked up the stone and seeing one of his assailants, threw it at him. The man, John McDermott, son of ex-Alderman McDermott, dropped, and Allward escaped. When McDermott's fellow ruffians found that he was hurt they proceed to help him to his home, about a quarter of a mile away. At first he could talk and walk, but he soon got worse, was taken into Constable Tallant's house, and died there in a few minutes. Allward, not knowing that he had hurt anyone seriously, had gone home. He was found asleep in bed, was arrested and locked up. An inquest was opened on Saturday. Arthur Mitchell, one of the gang, told how Allward had been waylaid and how McDermott had met his death. A post mortem resulted in the finding of a large fracture in the dead man's skull, and a large clot of blood pressing against his brain. The proceedings were adjourned until Tuesday. Everett, who, with Mitchell and McDermott, the deceased, were the leaders of the "rocking" gang, gave evidence. He was within five feet of the deceased when he was struck and fell, but he could not say how or who struck him. The other members of the gang were Alex. McCaskill, Geo. Bell, Joseph McGarth, Joseph McSherry, who were from twelve to nineteen years of age, and went up with the other three more as hangers-on, to see the fun, than as participants. It was sworn in evidence that Allward, the prisoner, had been hit three times, one of the stones knocking off his hat. When he stooped to pick it up he found the stone and threw it, which, it is said, did not strike the ground, and someone fell. The jury retired about 1 o'clock, and after about two hours and a half returned with the following verdict:—"We, the Coroner's jury investigating the cause of John McDermott's death, find that the deceased received the injuries which caused his death through being hit by a stone, but by whom the stone was thrown the evidence does not show. We also find that the parties who went with the express purpose of breaking the law are accessories before the fact."

A Remarkable Speech.

Major General Herbert has greatly pleased the French-Canadians by a reference he made in his speech at the drill hall, at Montreal, on Saturday night. In addressing the 65th Battalion, the French Canadian regiment, the General said:—"I am happy to be with you, because you recall to mind the most beautiful pages of Canadian history. I think that I see in you the descendants of those heroes who fought under Montcalm, under Levis, and under the Marquis de Vaudreuil. Do not forget that you belong to the same race as your brave countrymen who belonged to the Regiment of Pontifical Zouaves, the crusaders of the nineteenth century. That noble regiment rendered itself illustrious in defending the Church at Castel Fidardo, Mentana, Monte Libretti, Monte Roland, and even under the walls of Rome, the Eternal City. You see that good examples strike you upon all sides."

The Minerve to day, referring to the General's remarks, says:—"It is useless to conceal the satisfaction that we feel at words so encouraging and sympathetic as those pronounced by the brave general commanding the Canadian forces. In these days, when the French language and the Roman Catholic religion are attacked and persecuted by the Orange lodges and the fanatics of certain English provinces of this Dominion, it is consoling to see a man, a soldier, a general of the English army, teaching a lesson to these snobs, who threaten to attack our language and religion. We thank General Herbert, in the name of the 65th Battalion, in the name of the glorious Pontifical Zouaves, and in the name of the whole French-Canadian race."

It is Not Wise.

Hamilton Times.

After over ten years' experience trying to enforce prohibition, Iowa has gone back to a license system compared with which that of Ontario is severity itself. There is always danger that zeal may be exercised without discretion, and in this way much injury is done even to the cause of temperance by the interperate conduct of well-meaning friends. It is not wise to get far ahead of a good healthy public opinion.

For Over Fifty Years

The Sharon conspiracy case concluded on Tuesday. Mrs. Evans, and two young men, Osman and Pegg, were accused of conspiring to poison Mrs. Evans's husband, who is a hotel keeper, and with having given him strychnine. Mrs. Evans's relations with Osman appeared by the evidence to have been too intimate and the husband to have been an obstacle to their intercourse. Mrs. Evans and Osman were found guilty, but Pegg was discharged. Sentence was deferred.

At Tuesday's Police Court at Hamilton Alexander Cruickshank, head master of Hess Street School, was charged with assaulting Wm. Hale, one of the scholars. The evidence for the prosecution was that defendant severely whipped Hale on Friday for alleged truancy, when the boy had taken a note from his mother excusing his absence from school on Thursday afternoon. Defendant's plea was that he thrashed the boy to preserve discipline in the school. Magistrate Jelfs decided that defendant had no justification for whipping the boy so severely, and he fined him $10, afterwards reducing it to $5. Defendant said he would appeal.

Alpheus Cleophas Morton who moved in the British House of Commons to abolish the annuity to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, is remembered at Stratford, Ont., as an immigrant boy who came there with his parents some years ago. The prospects there, says the Beacon, were not sufficiently alluring, and after a time the young man went back to England to seek fame and fortune. When His Honor Judge Woods visited the British House of Commons last year he recognized Mr. Morton and an acquaintance begun when both were school boys in Stratford was happily renewed. The emigrant boy is on his way to both fame and fortune.

THEY SPARRED FOR POINTS.

A Bevy of Giddy Girls Organize a Mill in a Back Parlor.

The girls had heard and read a good deal about boxing. One of them had a brother in the New York Athletic Club, and he had taken a lot of them to see some amateur sparring. Then the papers had contained paragraphs about lady boxers, and altogether the girls thought it would be just lovely to have some quiet boxing among themselves. In talking it over one of them called attention to the fact that men appeared for this sport in a costume more or less generally the latter, especially designed to give the muscles full play. The implied suggestion was daring and the girls were aghast. The bolder ones, understand me, they were nice girls, and bold as applied to them doesn't mean anything that is not nice; it is simply an innocent comparative term. Well, then, the bolder ones were for rigging out in tights, trunks and doublets or something or other equally interesting; others suggested purloining their brothers' knickerbocker bicycle suits; and still others thought the idea rather horrid, though it was plain to see that it had its thrilling attractions for them. At last it was arranged that there should be a meet, as they called it, in the parlors of one of them, and it was left to the maidenly discretion of each girl to wear what she deemed to be proper. Then came the problem of obtaining gloves. The girl with the athletic brother volunteered to look out for that matter, and so it came about that he of the New York club got on to the scheme. His sister was not sufficiently diplomatic in her borrowing of the gloves, and the brother was just wicked enough to keep his ears and eyes open until the whole plan was substantially known to him. The fun was to take place in the rear parlor, and to further protect themselves from observation the girls drew the portieres that hung between the two rooms. Then they proceeded to prepare for the contests. Each girl had dressed at home, so it was only necessary to lay aside more or less outer garments to be in trim for the ring. None of them had finally ventured to don tights, but more than one filled a suit of knickerbockers to repletion. Others wore ordinary dresses which they looped up sufficiently to allow of exercising movements successfully. After the to-be-expected time spent in giggling and timorous exclamations, two girls put on gloves and prepared to spar. The wicked brother says that the sparring, scientifically considered, would not have done credit to toddling infants, but he admits that the exhibition was nevertheless as interesting as any he ever saw in the boxing line. But it didn't last long. The two girls, one in kickerbockers, the other in short skirts, capered about the floor and tried energetically to hit each other, while the other girls dodged the combatants and uttered suppressed screams. Pretty soon one of them tripped over an ottoman that had not been sufficiently removed from the scene of action, and as she fell she convulsively laid hold of her antagonist, and the latter reached after the umpire, and all together the three went down in a heap of well-hosed limbs and disordered drapery. The shriek that attended this catastrophe was followed by a brief interval of scared silence, which was broken by two suspicious clicks from beneath the portieres. Then there was commotion redoubled, for the girls tumbled at once. The wicked brother had taken snap shots with a dreadful camera at the scene. Quickly realizing that the worst had happened, and that nothing more was to be lost, several of the girls made a break for the front parlor. The brother stood his ground, and, overcome with laughter, allowed the furious maidens to wrench his camera from him, and he didn't enter a single protest when they proceeded to stamp it to pieces.

"It was an old, worthless machine," he explained afterward, "and it couldn't have taken a picture even if there had been light enough, which there wasn't. But I guess the girls won't try any private sparring again."—N. Y. correspondent Cincinnati Enquirer.

"HOW TO LIVE."

President Eliot's Interesting but by No Means Perfect Code of Life.

To all the other sage counsels as to how a man should divide his time, President Eliot, of Harvard University, has added another, giving in a recent address the following regimen: Sleep, eight hours; meals, three hours. outdoor exercise, two hours; social calls, one hour; work, ten honrs. That this plan agrees with Professor Eliot, says The Chicago Record, may be taken for granted. But, as an Eastern contemporary points out, it would not have suited Sir William Jones, the author of

"Seven hours to law, to soothing slumber seven,
Ten to the world allot and all to heaven."

Nor Sir Edward Coke, who wrote

"Six hours to sleep, in law's grave study six;
Four spend in prayer; the rest on nature fix,"

Nor would it have suited the physician who prescribed an equal division of eight hours each to work, sleep and recreation. Least of all would it have suited the American philosopher who said: "Six hours sleep for a man; seven for a woman; eight for a fool."

In fact, it ought to have been apparent to President Eliot that no code of life will suit any one man save that which he learns to invent for himself. Regularity is the main thing to be considered. Some men work best at night; some early in the morning; some need 10 hours' sleep; some need only six. Some want but one good meal a day; some want four. Indeed, how he shall manage himself and his time is one of the first—and hardest—practical questions which a man not under prison rule has to solve.

If any other eminent college man wants to give advice of this sort to his fellows he would better content himself with telling them what not to do. There's plenty of that counsel needed in an age when the average specimen of mankind is stuffing himself with too heavy meals, sleeping at irregular hours, smoking more cigars and drinking more whisky and worrying more prodigiously than would be good for a man of twice his physical strength and health.

Sheet Iron.

The thinnest iron sheet in the world has within the past few weeks been rolled in Swansea, Wales. It is twenty-five centimetres long and fourteen wide. Its thickness is exactly .005 millimetre. One may get an idea of this "thickness" by comparing it to that of silk paper, which is ordinarily .02 millimetre thick. Some iron manufacturers have advertised that they make visiting cards of thin iron plates. The longest steel chip is seventy-nine and one-half metres long and was turned in New York.
