IMPORTANT TO HOTEL KEEPERS, GROCERS, PROVISION STORES AND OTHERS.

We hereby give notice of my intention to supply PICKLES, mixed or otherwise, TOMATO SAUCE, CATSUP KETCHUP, &c. wholesale.

The increase of trade during the last four years compelled me to enlarge my manufactory I decided to make the wholesale trade my special purpose.

Stock I have now is undoubtedly the largest in Canada, and the question of quality is readily decided by making known the fact that I raise my vegetables from seed procured at any expense, feeling it is the best; they will therefore bear favorable comparison with any imported.

Another and important fact is that being made and manufactured in Ottawa thereby saving freight, packing, duty and other expenses I am enabled to sell full 40 per cent lower than the importer.

These advantages, I think, cannot fail to recommend those who may favor me with their orders.

Dinner to the Archbishop of Syra and Tenos.

From the London Times January 28.

On Tuesday an intertainment full of interest, and in many respects unprecedented in its character, was given at Westminster, Archbishop Lycurgus, one of the principal hierarchs of that portion of the Greek Church belonging to the kingdom of Greece, was invited to dinner, and the use of the Jerusalem Chamber was granted for the occasion by the Dean of Westminster, who presided. The number of those who could be present was limited by 40 by the size of the apartment, but the following were among those occupying seats at the table:—The Archbishop of Syra and Tenos, His Excellency the Greek Minister, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Rochester, the Bishop of Ely, the Bishop of Colombo, the Earl of Glasgow, Lord Elgin, the Very the Archimandrite in the suite of the Archbishop, the Rev. Archimandrite Morfinos, the Rev. the Archimandrite Stratuli, a deacon of the Greek Church, Mr. Crawford M.P., Sir K. Phillimore, Mr. MaMavogordato, Mr. Mr. Ralli, Mr. Freshfield, Mr. Agathides, Rev. W. Rogers, Mr. Gilbert Scott, Mr. Gibbs, &c.

According to Eastern custom, the Archbishop and his clergy came robed and wearing a lofty black head-dress, which was not removed during the evening, the Archbishop being distinguished from the members of his suite not merely by personal stature, but by the supperior size and brilliancy of the Greek cross which he wore as an ornament supended from the neck, and which glittered conspicuously by contrast with his dark robes. Some preliminary arrangements was needed in placing the guests so as to overcome the conversational difficulty, but it turned out that the Archbishop was an excellent German scholar, and most of the members of his suite spoke some other language serving as a vehicle of communication. Grace was said in Greek by the Dean of Westminster; and after dinner, which was well served by Messrs. King and Brymer, several toasts were given.

The Dean, in proposing the usua loyal toasts, touched gracefully upon the cession to Greece of what was, till recently, a very beautiful portion of the Queen's dominions; and glanced likewise at the close connection existing by marriage between the Prince of Wales and the young King of Greece.

The toasts and the introductory observations were very warmely received.

The Dean, again rising, said—I have now to propose the most important toast of the evening. "The health of his Holiness the Archbishop of Syra and Tenos." (applause). In introducing this toast, and in speaking from this chair, I cannot help recalling the last occasion upon which this Chamber was used for similar purposes. It is more than 200 years since my predecessor, Dean Williams, was ordered or invited by King James I. to entertain the French Ambassador and French ecclesiastics, who came to negotiate the marriage between Prince Charles and the French Princess Henrietta Maria. Then, as now, the foreign dignitaries were invited, before they came to dinner, to see the statelness of the building; then, as now, the organ touched by one of the best fingers of the age—at that time Orlando Gibbons, and now one well-known to all within the precincts; then, as now, they heard the exquisite voices of the choirmen and choristers; then, as now, the Dean confidently caused the Liturgy to be translated into their own language, to show that in that form of worship in which they worshiped God, there was nothing that savoured of any corruption of doctrine or of heresy to be reported to those from whom they came. That, I believe, was the last occasion on which this Chamber was used for purposes of a similar kind. I do not venture to pursue the parallel further; indeed, to do so might be inconvenient, for the very eminent and able man who was at that time Dean of Westminster, was afterwards sent to the Tower twice—once by the King and once by the Commons. (Laughter). But traces of that entertainment are still left among us. That magnificent chimney-piece of cedar wood at the opposite end of the room was erected by the Dean of Westminster to commemorate that very occasion, and if you look you will see the heads of Prince Charles and of Princess Henrietta Maria engraved on the wood of the corbels, and on the panels you will see the arms of my distinguished predecessor. But to turn to the more immediate occasion of our assembling. Our entertainment this evening is of a humbler kind. It has been provided—how? Not by Royal command, not to cement regal marriages, but by the kindness of private friends, and to express cordial sympathy between man and man, between sister races and between sister Churches. (applause). And when I look around upon the company assembled in this Chamber, I cannot help seeing a series of most happy and opportune coincidences, each of which is symbolical of the sentiments which have dictated the whole. We are seated in the Chamber of Jerusalem. What happier name or place to receive the representative of those far off Churches of which Jerusalem is the mother and mistres? In the case of our honored guest it is doubly appropriate, for he, as I understood, received his first and last ordination in the holy city of Jerusalem, in the very church of the Holy Sepulchre. It is useful even for Englishmen to be reminded by the presence of our guest that there is a land more dear to us from our childhood even than England; that there is a city more sacred even than Rome, or Geneva, or Westminster; that land is the land of the East, and that city is Jerusalem. But our guest of this evening comes to us, not only as a representative of the Eastern Churches, but of the Greek Church in particular—not only of the Greek Church generally, but of the many Isles of Greece. I do not forget that the Greek Church has a larger and wider meaning; it embraces not only the little kingdom of Greece, not only the ancient common wealths of Greece, but that wider dominion of which, not Athens, but Constantinople is the centre. The chief dignitary of the old Greek Church is the great State officer of another and vaster Empire. All honor be to that Turkish Empire for the toleration which he there enjoys. All honor be to the illustrious person who fills the See of Chrysostum. No ecclesiastic of our day, East or West, has made an utterance which has commanded more general assent at the hand of intelligent men than the reply of the Patriarch of Constantinople to the Court of Rome last year. (Applause). I will let the Prelate opposite speak the kindness with which our country and that great capital of the old Roman Empire have been received. According to the more special representation of the Greek Church which we have among us this evening, I would ask what traveler is there who does not know the nature of that rocky pyramid rising from the waves of the Ægean, the centre of modern commerce, the centre of the group of those famous Islands, every one of which teems with pious recollections? Here lies the region in which the residence of his Holiness is placed. From that rocky post—a true overseer, a true Episcopos—he overlooks Tenos, the faithful friend of Athens in old days; and Melos—alas! her domed enemy—and, most instructive and significant spot, to which no diocese in Europe can offer any parallel, he overlooks the sacred isle of Delos, the birthplace of Apollo, the God of the Muses, the oracle of Greece, the inspirer of Grecian literature. (Applause). There are many clouds that hang over the modern Greek kingdom, the modern Greek race, and the modern Greek Church. But in its quickness, its readiness, and its eagerness for its destruction, the people is well worthy of its illustrious Pegan forefathers. And surely the Greek Church is destined, if any branch at all of the Eastern Church is destined to show the people the truth which I, for one, will never fear to surrender—that the cause of freedom and progress are compatible, and are alone compatible, with the true, ancient, orthodox faith of the earliest ages. (Applause). If, on the other side, our distinguished guest represents the venerable traditions of the far off Jerusalem, the race of Shem; on the other side he represents the aspirations of the Isles of the West—the race of Javan, and as such we of the yet further Western Isles hold out our hand of fellowship, and here again our guest finds himself at home among us. He has left then, the Isles of Greece, which eternal summer gilds while we are wrapt in winter fogs. He has left

"The isle of Greece,
"Where glow the arts of war and peace,
"Where Delos rose and Phœbus sprung."

And yet, even in this winter cold, he finds himself in an island of Apollo. This spot where we are now sitting was, we are told by ancient tradition, once the site of the temple of Apollo; and this Chamber is not only the Chamber of Jerusalem, but on that occasion of which I spoke at the beginning, when my predecessor entertained here the French Ambassador, he was compared by his admirers to the great Roman Lucullus, and this was called his Chamber of Apollo. (Applause.) To the Chamber of Apollo, therefore, as well as to the Chamber of Jerusalem, to the seats of learning, and of freedom and of progress, as well as to the seats of religion and faith, knowing that both ought to be united in ourselves, as to-day. (Applause.). And this union is yet further exemplified in the eminent person whom we have among us. Representing as he does by his office the venerable traditions of the East, he represents also by his education and acquirements the aspiration of modern science and theology. He has studied in the great schools of learning, which are to the modern world what Athens and Alexandria were to the ancient world. If he is a Greek by race he is a German by training and instruction. He has studied as few, very few, other prelates have studied. at Leipsic, at Berlin, and Halle. He has engrafted on the stock of Chrysostum and Basil the learning of Tholuck and Winer. A book, by a distinguished divine of Strasbourg, which a friend of mine was saying he would, above all others, recommend to the attention of all candidates for ordination, is one of the works most valued in the library of the Archbishop of Syra. (Applause.) One more observation and I have done. This day is the festival, not of a Greek apostle, but of an of apostle, who was born and bred in the Greek city of Larsus, and learned in all the wisdom of the Greek race. It is a day peculiarly suited to the welcome of our guest from the shores of the same Ægean Sea. He is, I was going to say, the first Grecian Archbishop who has ever trod these shores; but this would not be correct. One Greek Archbishop we have had before, and he came from the very birth place of St. Paul. Theodore of Tarsus is the only Greek who ever sat on the throne of Canterbury, and he, in the seventh century, was the founder of the learning of the English Church. He, rather than Alfred, laid the foundations of our great University; not in Oxford, but in Canterbury, and on the banks of the Tyne and Wear. From him, as William of Malmebury calls it, there flowed "a fountain of knowledge and a river of civilization." This we owe to the Greek Archbishop; but we pay back the debt with usury. And there was one other characteristic of Theodore's influence which we may still have from his successors in the East. The Saxon Chronicle says of him, "Before Theodore, the Bishops were all Romans, afterwards they were English." That is the quality which the Greek Church and which the English Church have in common They are both national Churches, (applause)—both represent the genius of their country; they can both look on each other and on other Churches without desire to convert or absorb. What my predecessor said to the French ecclesiastic may still more truly be said to our distinguished Greek guests to-day. "There ought to be no secret antipathies between Churches, for which no reason can be given, but let every house sweep the dust from their own door." (Much laughter and applause.) We have our vocation, the Greeks have theirs. We have our faults; they have theirs. Let us each do the best we can, and we shall be pursuing the best because the only practicable course, towards the attainment of our common end. With thoughts like these, which have been suggested by the presence of our distinguished guest, and with the utmost sincerity and cordiality of feeling. I beg now to propose the health of the Holiness the Archbishop of Syra and Tenos, adding a wish which I have often heard from the lips of a wayfarer on the hillside of his native country—"May our years be many"—(these words the Dean added in modern Greek, to the gratification and no small surprise of the Archbishop, who was evidently unprepared for the familiar solution at the close of a long speech in English.)

The toast was received with great cordiality, and the Archbishop bowed respectfully in acknowledgement of the compliment, to which in words that might be generally intelligible he was unable to reply.

The Greek Minister, by whom the duty of returning thanks was undertaken felt doubtful of his ability to do so in English, and begged that he might be allowed to use the language of diplomacy. Speaking in French, M. Armeni thanked the company in the name of the illustrious and venerable prelate, his countrymen, for the honor they had preferred, which was but one of numerous acts of kindness, cordiality, and sympathy of which he had found himself the object during his stay in England. The Dean had done but justice to the Greek nation in asserting that with them; as with the English people, religion entered into their national life, and was not regarded as incompatible with liberty or development, social or political. Science even was not, as some asserted, inconsistent with religion, for though some day to day, with feeble, hands men pushed as far as they could the progress of scientific discovery and research God was the God of Science as well as of Revelation, and he had placed before us Christianity as an ideal superior to all which progress had accomplished, or which yet remained for it to accomplish. (Applause). Passing a warm eulogium upon the spirit which had led England to cede the Ionian Islands, of which he was himself a native, and upon individual acts of generosity to Greece—such as the self devotion of Lord Byron and the foundation by Lord Guilford of a University for the education of Greek youths—his excellency made a brief allusion to the circumstances of his country. In many respects it might not yet be all that Englishmen could desire; but it was young and would improve. (Applause). He claimed for its people that they were active in the cause of education and liberal ideas; and among its more eminent sons none were more remarkable for energy and devotion than the band of noblehearted clergymen of whom their guest of that evening was so illustrious an example.

The Earl of Glasgow proposed the "health of the Bishops," coupling with the toast the health of the Bishop of London.

The Bishop of London expressed regret that the Archbishop of Canterbury had been prevented from receiving the Archbishop of Syra, as he desired to do. His Grace had, however, made known his desire that nothing should be wanting to the reception of their distinguished guest in a manner befitting not only his exalted rank, but his personal qualities. Probably the scene which they had witnessed that day of an Archbishop of the Eastern Church being present at the consecration of a Bishop of the English Church was unparalelled, and
