Annual Circular.

Office and Salesroom, Rideau Street, No. 1, East End, Sappers' Bridge.

Ottawa, March 1st, 1870.

The subscriber in issuing his eighth Annual Circular, would remind his friends, to whom he returns thanks for past favours, that he continues to give his personal attendance to the sale of every description of goods and property confided to his management.

His lengthened experience in the management and proper system of selling Household furniture at private residences, together with all the details of arrangement, expeditious delivery &c., would lead him again to solicit further sales in his line from those contemplating the disposal of furniture, by auction, he would be glad to have an early intimation in order that satisfactory arrangements may be completed for the approaching Spring sale, it is desirable to select an early day.

Account sales have been promptly rendered and statements made out in a concise business-like manner, always accompanied with the proceeds in cash.

To Executors and Administrators of Estate, Official and other Assignees, and public corporations, this mode of selling property forms a speedy, legitimate and efficient way of closing Estates Legacies, &c , and removes a vast amount of responsibility.

Sales of groceries, hardware, crockery and general merchandise confided to his management will receive every attention. He need not remind his friends of his capability of conducting such sales satisfactorily.

The proper advertising and necessary precaution adopted by him in conducting underwriters' sales of damaged goods and produce sold for account of whom it may concern, or for breach of contract" should be borne in mind by merchants shippers and consignees, more especially as certain legal forms are necessary in such cases.

Appraisals and valuations made

Again soliciting your business favors, the undersigned ventures to hope that an active experience of years is some guarantee that he may be reasonably expected to carry out what he promises.

Conscience—Bishop Tache and the Hamilton "Spectator."

From the Ottawa Courier.

A Bishop may be a hero and there is frequently necessity for his being so. It was heroism in the seven Bishops, mentioned by Macaulay and other writers, who found it necessary to stand by the faith that was in them, and of many other Bishops whom we might name, while it was an unnecessary kind of heroism in a Bishop to be present as a combatant at the battle of the Boyne. All Bishops, like other men, need courage. There is a moral courage, which is almost indispensable to the position of a Bishop, of which it would seem the Hamilton Spectator is not aware, when he says "there is no reason why, ex-officio a Bishop should be a hero." Pope Pius the IX has, on more than one occasion proved himself to be a hero—as much of a hero as ever was Garibaldi. All men need courage—few possess it. A Bishop is none the less a man, that the Hamilton Spectator is unable to notice a priest's humanity through his cassock. The clergy assuredly do educate the conscience. That is their especial business. All the conscience that the writer in the Spectator has was probably obtained from contact with some clergyman in his early years. He has seemingly imbibed neither sense nor conscience with his mother's milk. The conscience is the concentration of knowledge—of that knowledge of good and evil, which must be acquired from some source. The conscience is an inward sense of right and wrong, according to the acquired knowledge of right and wrong—an abiding principle of mind which is never obliterated while consciousness lasts. It is impossible to be conscious of wrong without a knowledge of what wrong is, and conscience is the inward feeling of that which is either right or wrong, according to the information of which a being is possessed. If Bishop Tache trained Riel in knowledge at all, he trained him to a conscience, leading him to distinguish between what is generally accepted as right and what is generally accepted as wrong. Is it too much to suppose that a man trained in youth to consider it wrong to sin, might have an inward monitor warning him against the perpetration of wrong in connection with immediate and future consequences? We said that Riel had a conscience, educated by Bishop Tache, and which Riel feared. The expression is not new. There is scarcely novelty in the way of putting the idea. It is precisely the expression of Shakespeare, who says that conscience makes cowards of us all. We simply said that Riel, being a coward to his conscience, would not have slain Scott, except by doing violence to conscientious promptings of the consequences of sin implanted into his heart by his preceptor, Bishop Tache. Was this assertion disrespectful to the Bishop? That venerable prelate is now appealing to men's consciences. He is now successfully appealing to the better parts of men's natures, quieting down the irritation which Riel had stirred up, at Red River. Bishop Tache's power over men's consciences, is the real and only available power, which he possesses. It is the power of right as opposed to wrong, which he himself has received and practices by an inspiration derivable from his sacred calling. Bishop Tache's appeal is as that of the Divine Spirit appealing to human souls. Bishop Tache, in precept and by example, holds aloft the cross of Him, who was all love, and peace, and charity, and good will. There is only one other appeal stronger than this, which is, if possible, to be avoided—the bayonet.

"An aitch-dropper" writes to the Pall Mall Gazette in deprecation of the "orthoepic crusade" long waging against the Cockney paynims for the recovery of the H. of the 'Oly Sepulchre. According to his theory, the aspirate is a violation of the laws of physiology, and its retention by Irish, North-countrymen, and Dutch is to be regarded as a sort of conspiracy against the rest of the world to perpetuate an unnatural sound which ought to have been consigned to oblivion with the obsolete guttural in England, as it has been discarded in French, Italian, Spanish, and Greek. Ancient authority, is cited in support of modern usage, and Virgil, who wrote "aena" for "ahena" is adduced as the prototype and example of those within the atmospheric disturbance of Bow Bells, whose diaphrams balk the exasperating utterance of such a phrase as "He has heard him;" a feat, by the way, to the performance of which, without the aid of undue emphasis, our Londoner challenges the world of critics. Leaving, then, the dead languages to bury their dead letter H, the writer assumes the offensive and stands forth a champion to avenge the "syllabic death of the medical and final R," and to objurgate the tyrannical conscription of that consonant in "He had no idea—r—of Height." We, in our far-off literary degeneracy, can only wait for our mother country's decision concerning our mother tongue, and, while lamenting that our insufficient physiological development has not yet raised our aspirations above the barbarous aspirate, wonder at the civilized magnanimity that has so long tolerated in English poetry the anginose line:

"'Ow 'igh 'is Hhonor 'olds 'is 'aughty 'ead."

The Belleville Intelligencer raised an alarmist cry and prognostication of disaster to the Red River expedition on the ground that the number of men to be sent is insufficient. It accepts the report that only a thousand men are to be sent, and says very confidently that there is no longer any doubt that one thousand men is the number—seven hundred volunteers and three hundred regulars—the Government has determined to send to establish Canadian authority in the Red River territory. If it be a fact that the numerical strength of the expeditionary force will be thus limited, there will be found many who will agree in the opinion that it would be more prudent to make it stronger; but who may not be as ready to share in the gloomy forebodings of danger from Fenians and disaster to the expedition indulged in by the Intelligencer. We may have a confidence that as the honour and safety of the Imperial troops is at stake the officers who have planned and have undertaken the responsibility of commanding have at last made sure of having an adequate force to meet all the risks that can possibly be apprehended. Instead of joining in the outcry, then, it will be better to wait the development of the government policy, which is soon to be unfolded in the House of Commons. It is not a desirable role to play at the present juncture that of croakers and alarmists. Volunteering should be encouraged by all fair and truthful means; and we believe that such is the ardour for service against all that the Government has only to call in a proper and liberal manner for all the men required to have the battallions speedily filled up with the pick and flower of the active militia force.—Kingston Daily News.
