

Refugee support group calls Halton residents to action

It's been five months since the death of Alan Kurdi, and four months since one Halton group decided they would help in every way they could towards the Syrian refugee crisis.

On Sept. 2, media all over the world reported on the three-year-old boy found lifeless on a Turkish beach. By Sept. 9, nine people living in Halton joined together and decided they would focus their efforts on bringing a Syrian family to Ontario.

The group, called Terra Firma Halton, got right to work, and soon they realized they had to obtain a sponsorship agreement holder to get the ball rolling. Through one of the members, they were able to fill the position with the Unitarian Congregation of Mississauga, and things started to happen.

"They wanted three levels of involvement, so a steering committee and the organizers, some people that were on call, and silent partners," Balogh explained.

Positions were also created for treasurer, government liaison, and family liaison. By this time, more than 30 people were part of the group, all between Mississauga, Oakville and Halton, all sharing the dream of privately sponsoring a Syrian family.

The team turned to the Canadian Unitarian Council, an organization that provides support for religious exploration, spiritual growth and social responsibility in Canada, and was told they had to have a minimum of $30,000 to apply.

"So we created a bank account. All of the members in the group, which total close to 40, all made a private pledges, and luckily came up with the initial $30,000," Balogh said.

By December, the group was advised they were matched up with a family, but all the details are confidential at the present time.

To support the family for one year, the $30,000 might cover all the expenses. But Terra Firma Halton wants to make sure they're covered for the first two years, giving them a new total of $70,000.

"We're still wanting to move forward with more financing, just in case," member Pam Dickenson said. "We're supposed to look after the family for 12 months, but this could extend into two years. So we still need more money to carry us into the second year."

The money would go towards rent, food, education, clothing, an interpreter and anything health related, including dentist and doctor visits. Finding these resources were divided among the group, assigning members to find housing, clothing, furniture and other types of services, including childcare, employment and language training.

"We're very organized, I'm pleased to say," Balogh said.
