VANITY HARDWARE.

By ALAN MUIR.

Just before they went away that night—perhaps by the merest accident—Pembroke broke. Stepping into his small dining-room, found Vanity there alone. He bade her good-by, and he could not but see that she trembled.

"Good-bye, Vanity said. "I am so sorry for you. It will be dull here to night."

"Miss Hardware," he said, for the first time in all that trying day losing his self-possession. "I once hoped that you—that you—And I never thought that the hour would come when I should feel thankful that you refused. Now my misfortunes are mine alone."

Vanity hung her head. He could not see a feature of that downcast face. Only he saw her hand lingeringly.

"I thought," said Vanity, almost in a whisper, "that when a man lost his fortune he meant to let us share his sorrows as well as his joys."

"Augustus," said Maud that night, when they were in their own room, "how wonderfully Tom keeps up. At dinner he seemed really in good spirits."

"He has no end of courage," Augustus remarked.

"Now, I wonder," Maud Neville said, drawing off her rings with a thoughtful air, "I wonder had Vanity Hardware anything to say to it?"

CHAPTER XXIII.

FOR THE LAST TIME MISS AND I TALK THINGS OVER.

Just here miss laid her paper down and looked straight at me.

"Now, doctor."

"Now, miss," said I.

"What do you say?"

"Miss," I answered, "curious things happen. The very question I was going to ask you!"

"Do you like Vanity now?"

"This I will confess, miss," I said, "Her conduct the last few pages has been very pretty."

"Will she marry Tom Pembroke now?"

"Why, miss," said I, "she has as good as promised."

"But remember, doctor, he was a poor man before she would even give him a hope."

"No doubt," said I, "her behavior is uncommonly like the correct thing."

"I liked her from the first," miss remarked. "Depend upon it doctor, it takes a woman to understand a woman.

"The poor man make a poor hand of it mostly, miss?"

"Then she began to laugh.

"Which of us was thinking the novel, doctor?"

"You see, miss," said I, "things have got so mixed up that no one living can tell. But suppose we say that first it was you and me, and then me and you, and then you by yourself."

"And say what they may," miss remarked, "all that is not mine is yours, doctor. And we can explain how we came to know it all—every sentence."

Then she stopped again.

"Go ahead, doctor, we shall read the finish." Go-morrow, doctor, we shall read the finish." Miss spoke loud enough. But that night miss was suddenly called away to nurse a sister who was taken dangerously ill. She did not return home for six long months. Then she returned home for six long months. Then she returned home for six long months. Then she returned home for six long months. Then she returned only to be married; and all was done in such a hurry that I never saw her until the wedding bells were ringing. She had called on me the day but one before, and, like my luck, I was out. Dear heart! how she looked! Happy she looked coming out of the church, all blushes, satin, blossoms, lace and happiness! Happy as a young bride, when the churchyard was empty and all was over, I sat down on a tombstone, and looking down the road just where the last carriage turned the corner, I fell a thinking.

And when I was done my musing:

"Dear heart," said I remembering the story all at once, "The end of Vanity Hardware will never be told!"

CHAPTER XXIV.

FIVE YEARS AFTER.

Sixty-eight and five make seventy-three. When I wrote in the last few lines my age was sixty-eight. This day is Oct. 15, 1884. It is my seventy-third birthday, and a fine afternoon with a touch of frost in the air, and a touch of ice in the wind, and a touch of brown on the leaves of the trees in my little garden, and a touch of rheumatism in my old bones.

In July, this year, having a sudden fancy of a hundred pounds where I used to leave it to, and dred pounds where I used to leave it to, and my funeral expenses and little debts being sure to be covered by the sale of my few sticks of furniture, thought I to myself, I ought to take one more holiday before I lie down in the churchyard, and draw the green coverlet over this poor, old body for the long sleep. "Shake a leg, doctor, this summer, John Rose," said Tom Jones; leg this summer, John Rose." Shake a leg this summer, John Rose." said Tom Jones; summer line and cloudy skies, was and land, may be all one to you." Accordingly I packed my little matters up, took ticket per steamer to Liverpool, and there I found a friend in my door that Dr. Combe, and would return in a fortnight from date.

Here I remark that a pleasanter sail than this down British channels no man can take. On one side are the Welsh coast and hills, with here a busy town and there a hamlet nestling among the green slopes. Presently we got to Lynton; and the man who does not call those green mountains and rich valleys, sloping right down to the water's edge, so that you might almost fancy the woods and hills were continued under the blue ocean—the man who does not like Lynton, I was going to observe, had better wait for scenery till he gets into the next creation, it is not certain that he will find nothing better in the old one.

The water was smooth; and as we glided past mile after mile of coast, and it went behind and vanished, "Dear heart!" thought I, "just so my three-and-seventy years have slipped away. All many a bright and sunny spot I have left behind me, thought I. "In that long reach of years; nothing to come for my tottering feet, and white head like the merry days that are no more!" But when I turned round the land, and there where shining to the evening sun, brighter and more dear than ever, was my old home!

I was so full of these thoughts that I never noticed my neighbors. Presently, a little girl of three years I should say, dressed like real quality, just able to run on her feet, came to my knee and looked up in my face. A bright, handsome little face it was, with nose and mouth not so small little face it was, with nose and mouth not so small little face it was, with nose and mouth not so small
