KISSING COMPULSORY

IN THE ENGLISH TOWN OF HUNGERFORD.

The Men Must Perform This Osculatory Duty Each April—The Maidens Look Forward to the Pleasant Day.

The charming country town of Hungerford, in Kerkshire, has an annual kissing day each April, when it celebrates its Hocktide festival. Then certain duly appointed officials hold a court, collect the tithes and claim a kiss from the woman of each house they have to visit during the ceremony. The two fortunate officials thus appointed are known as "tutty men," or tithe men, and usually there is no small competition for the honor among the eligibles of Hungerford. The custom is hundreds of years old, and neither husband nor wife, as a rule, objects to the advent of the tutty men, with the inevitable result.

Once every five years the good town of Newcastle-on-Tyne has been in the habit of holding a festival known as "barge day," on which day the mayor and corporation go down the river in a fine state barge to claim the rights of the town to certain dues at an appointed spot. Then the procession returns up the river to a well-known stone, where the mayor selects any woman he likes from the large crowd generally there and kisses her before the assembled company—and let it be said softly—before the good mayoress herself. His worship then gives the favored woman a sovereign as a present, while the mayoress, to show that there is no ill-feeling, adds a gift of her own, such as a satchel, purse, or other appropriate article.

Not only is it the duty of the mayor to do the kissing in this fashion, but the appointed sheriff, not willing to be left out in the cold on such occasions, also duly carries out a similar privilege. He chooses another lady, and after saluting her gravely—or otherwise—he also hands to her a useful present. This curious ceremony, which is supposed to take place quinquennially, was last performed, I believe, in the year 1901. But of course it always rests with the mayor for the time being whether it shall be performed.

When the pretty Thames town of Maidenhead takes it into its head to have a "beating of the bounds" the steward appointed for that purpose is always accompanied by a large crowd of curious people. These help him, or think they do, when he has to climb over houses which stand in his path, or to get through windows under which the bounds pass. Also when the party meets any man by chance during its progress it proceeds gravely to "bump" that individual; but if the person met should be a lady she is given the choice as to whether she will be "bumped" or kissed.

Nor is England the only one with such compulsory kissing ceremonies. Halmagen, in Austria, has an annual fair on St. Theodore's day, at which every man present has the right to claim one lady and kiss her without her having any right to object. This strange custom is the outcome of a raid which was once made on the town by Turkish brigands, who carried off all the women as captives. But a band of men travelling in the district chanced to meet the captors and forced them to give up their victims, who were then kindly escorted to their homes and friends. In grateful remembrance of the day the maidens of Halmagen annually offer their lips modestly and freely to the strangers who frequent the town during the fair of St. Theodore.—London Answers.

ORIGIN OF QUOITS.

Dutch Kloot Shooting and Triddle on Baltic Coast.

The new English dictionary tells us that the origin of the word "quoit" is doubtful, adding, amid numerous medieval examples of the use of the word, a possible French source, and refers to the discus throwing of the Romans.

It is probable, however, that this ancient and, (alas!) rapidly dying old English game had a very different origin—namely, in the ports of our Saxon ancestors—and was neither French nor Roman.

Moreover, the word "quoit" itself has no very different pronunciation to the platt-deutsch word "kloot." And "kloot shooting," or ice bowling, (eis-bosseln), is still the national game of Friesland (whence came our Saxon ancestors), and also to a less extent of Holstein, (whence came the Angles). A somewhat similar ancient game called "triddle" obtains along the Baltic coast, and its pronunciation also is very similar. The main difference is that kloots is played with a wooden ball instead of an iron ring, and in the winter only, the reason for the choice of this season being partly that the ball may roll farther on the frozen pasture lands. A minor difference is that there is no mark in kloots.

But there was no mark originally in quoits, and as the word quoit itself is still sometimes applied to curling stones in Scotland, it may also be assumed that a ball may have been originally employed in England. Of course there was no iron in Friesland, and even if the game really owed its origin to the discus-throwing of the Romans, the necessity of dispensing with a valuable material like iron would have been sufficient to employ a hard wooden ball (it is made of apple wood or lignum vitæ—"pocked-holz" is the German word) in lieu of the discus. Like quoits, the game is played with an underhand throw, and sides are formed—usually village against village. What is very unusual in Germany is that stakes are played for, and a good deal of betting goes on—all of which completes the parallel. There are many instances of quarrels and even bloodshed over the stakes.

The kloot is a ball the size of a small orange, and is weighted with lead. A curved single plank stage is used for the throw-off, and the player invariably strips to his stockings, wearing no boots, and but a jersey and knickers, in order that he may avoid a slip in the short run that he takes. Sometimes he whirls his arm round and round like a sling, though this is now considered bad form. Eighty meters is considered a first-class throw, the shots of each side being pooled together and the highest total winning.

Prot. Reimann, of Jever, is an authority on the history of the game, and has written some accounts of the historical episodes connected with it in the periodical Der Freise. He tells us that in 1755 a brother of the Empress Catherine of Russia (then lord of Jever) ineffectually prohibited the game altogether on the remarkable ground that it did not form one of the Olympian games of the Greeks. Really the reason of the prohibition was the quarreling and fighting over the stakes that occurred. On one occasion King George I England was appealed to—as king of Hanover. The last riot happened as late as 1833.

Prof. Reimann has unearthed a mediæval code of rules of the game, and it is certain that its origin is lost in antiquity.

All the technical terms employed are in the ancient Platt-deutsch—a language decidedly more akin to England than to modern German. The game is also played in West Friesland, in Holland. Great contests are invariably attended by crowds of Dutch visitors, and are sometimes honored by the presence of the Grand Duke of Oldenburg.—Pall Mall Gazette.

DESERT LIFE.

How Animals and Vegetation Are Protected.

Almost all life on the desert goes armed. In the vegetation world of the desert the cactus comes first with its numberless species. They are all armed with long or short touch spikes that can penetrate the thickest boot. The solitary and often grotesque "Joshua," or Yucca, the mesquite, the catsclaw and numberless shrubs whose names have not been written, all are armed in one way or another. Some exude poisonous sap, others nauseating odors. The sagebrush is about the only one that does not seem to have any protection.

In the animal kingdom most are either armed with sharp teeth, spines, odors, or poison to serve to keep their enemies at a distance, while the others depend upon their fleetness or artful skulking and hiding.

The spined and repulsive Gila monster, the horned toad, the sidewinder with his two horns and deadly fangs, and its cousin the desert rattlesnake; the tarantula, scorpion, and desert bee, each of whose sting is exceedingly painful and sometimes fatal, are among the desert's denizens. Then there are many varieties of lizards, large and small and of many colors, who protect themselves by their speed alone. The prowling coyote, boycat, mountain lion, jack rabbit, cotton tail, mountain sheep, ibex, antelope and an occasional deer are there.

Among the smaller animals are the gopher, kangaroo rat, trade rat, hydrophobia skunk, ground squirrel and innumerable mice. But the traveller seldom sees any of these. The prospector, however, soon becomes acquainted with them. The first, or at the latest, second night of his stay in any one camp, he will be visited by a trade rat, who will carry away all that portion of his outfit that is not too heavy for his ratship to handle, and religiously leave some stick or stone in its place.

The hydrophobia skunk will be apt to call and lunch from any bacon rinds that may be lying about, not disdaining a nip at Mr. Prospector's nose if the opportunity offers. It is said and firmly believed by the sons of the desert that the bite of this little skunk produces hydrophobia. The Gila monster is seldom seen, and the writer having spent nearly a year on the borders of the Death Valley, has yet to see one of them at large. Rattlesnakes are also scarce, except in some favorable locality.

The mountain sheep and ibex are gradually becoming tame, and this summer they have come to springs where miners were camped as regular as domestic stock and with little more timidity. The mountain quail follows the miner and his burro. In the Avawatz Mountains they were unknown until this year, but they are abundant there now. It is an unwritten law among the miners on the desert that no game animals or birds shall be killed or in anyway disturbed unless one is in actual want, and he must make proof convincing of that fact if he kills a quail or sheep.

All life on the desert lives by its power to resist thirst. All desert plants are so constructed that they are able to conserve and store up moisture against the time of drought. This necessity has wrought peculiar forms of both animals and plants, and in time it also leaves its indelible mark upon men who dwell amid its wastes. The leaves of all desert trees are small and thick, so that they expose as little surface as possible for evaporation in the dry air. The great and ever present struggle for water is noticeable everywhere where men come together on the desert. In this struggle all who come to the desert must engage instantly. Every wagon must have its water barrels, every burro his water bags, each man his canteen.—From the Los Angeles Times.

A VALUABLE WORK.

Genesis of Churches in the United States of America, in Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada, by James Croil, author of "The Missionary Problem," "The Noble Noble Army of Martyrs," etc.

It is with great pleasure that we welcome another volume from the pen of the former genial editor of the Canadian Presbyterian Record. Though Mr. Croil is now in his eighty-sixth year, he still retains great mental vigor, and that catholicity of spirit which has ever been a distinguishing feature. Mr. Croil's first publication was a prize essay on the county of Dundas, to be followed by "The Missionary Problem," "The Noble Army of Martyrs," "The History of Steam Navigation," and other books.

The present volume does not pretend to be a church history, its object is merely to give a short account of the origin and early development of some of the more interesting and important churches and congregations in the United States, Canada and Newfoundland. The information has been gathered from every available source, and has been fused with great judgment.

Mr. Croil is an elder in St. Paul's church, Montreal, and is firm in his attachment to the principles of the Presbyterian church, yet in reading this book it would be difficult to determine to what Christian denomination he really belongs, as all are treated in the same Catholic spirit, and with the same impartiality. The book is dedicated to the Archbishop of Canterbury. Each denomination receives due consideration, even Hebrews and the Mormons are not forgotten, whilst the Salvation Army is duly recognized.

The author has been singularly happy in his selection of illustrations, as they present many of the best types of ecclesiastical architecture on this continent.

Got Rid Of His Company.

Kansas City Star.

A visitor at a health springs was disinclined to sociability. After he had been there a few days a young woman stopping at the same hotel took pity on his seeming loneliness and tried to engage him in conversation. After a few conventional remarks she asked what had brought him to the springs. "Fits," he replied, confidingly—"fits. And I'm so glad to make acquaintances, for the doctor doesn't want me to be alone, not even for two minutes." The young woman disappeared, and the unsociable man was bothered no more.

Clock Entirely Of Straw.

An extraordinary addition has been made to the exhibition of inventions now being held in Berlin. A shoemaker named Wagner, living in Strasburg, has sent in a clock of the grandfather shape, nearly six feet high, made entirely of straw. The wheels, pointers, case and every detail is exclusively of straw. Wagner has taken fifteen years to construct this strange piece of mechanism. It keeps perfect time, but under the most favorable circumstances cannot last longer than two years.

Get What You Ask For.

There are many reasons why you ask for advertised articles, but absolutely none why you should let a substituting dealer palm off something which he claims to be "JUST AS GOOD" or "BETTER" or "THE SAME THING" as the article you requested.

The advertised article must of necessity be of the highest quality, otherwise it could not be successfully sold and the advertising continued.

The buying public recognizes the superior quality of advertised articles. The substitutor realizes the fact and tries to sell inferior goods on the advertiser's reputation.

The Make Believe Menace.

The danger to which we, as a country, are at present exposed is the peril of the make-believe. It is the age of the masquerader. Men are not what they seem. They pretend for a profit. They join a church for the sake of business patronage. They parrot the old to be on the safe side. They take the dogma with the dollar. They stay in the old ruts rather than risk the financial wrench of getting out. But how mean and contemptible, after all! God send us men who will dare to risk something for the sake of the truth! If you have been pretending, behold your sin and shame!
