SATURDAY EVENING, SEPT. 27.

Penelope's Web.

My father and mother-in-law were sitting, one on each side of the open fire. My father was reading the Country Gentleman—my mother was knitting a mitten. She usually was knitting either a mitten, or a little red stocking, or a baby's shoe, or a wristlet, or a shawl. Her eyes were not good by gas-light; and, as she was a manager of the Old Ladies Home, a visitor at the Orphan Asylum, and a friend and protector to forlorn children in general, she was never at a loss where to bestow her knitted goods. Not a baby on our square but came into an inheritance of mother's pretty work as surely as into a world of sin, and misery.

Missing the click of the needles, as one does miss a quiet sound to which the ear has grown used, I looked up. My mother had laid down her work, and was engaged in tying knots at different intervals in a length of double worsted. My father had dropped his paper, and was regarding her with an amused smile, in which there was a world of tenderness and gentleness.

"What are you trying to do, mother dear?" said I, at last.

"I am trying to see whether I can remember how I used to make harness!" answered the dear old lady, with a smile and a little sigh. "Not the kind they put upon horses!" she explained, seeing my puzzled look; "but that which belongs to a loom."

"I never saw a loom!" said I.

"Ah, then I can hardly make you understand. The harness is a very essential part of an old-fashioned loom."

"Did you know how to weave?" I asked.

"That she did, as well as Penelope her namesake!" said my father, answering for her. "I think, however, she would have disposed of the suitors more easily than that lady did." And my father quoted some Greek which sounded very nicely though I didn't understand it. The old gentleman read the classics a great deal in the original, and was rather fond of quoting them. "I believe," he continued, after a pause, "that I owe my wife to her skill in weaving."

"Tell me about it!" said I glad of anything to divert me. You see my husband was away about his business as an insurance adjustor, and there had been so many bad accidents that I could not help being anxious about him.

"Yes, do, father!" said my mother.

"Well, you must know, then," the old gentleman began; "that I was an only child, and my parents naturally thought a deal of me. They moved from Vermont into the Genesee country at a very early day—indeed my father was one of the first settlers of Bloomfield. Some day we will go back there, and see the old place. It was wild enough when they went there; but in my time the wilderness was subdued, and blossomed like the rose. My father owned two hundred acres, and owned a sugar-bush and a potashery. Potash used to be called Genesee money in those days, because the merchants made their remittances to New York and Montreal in that form. Well, I always had a turn for books and study, and I was not more than twelve years old when my father promised me, that if I would stay and help him till I was eighteen, he would send me to college. I was very happy in the prospect, for from the moment he said so, I knew the thing was as sure as any human arrangement can be. So I went to school winters, doing my Latin and Greek with the master, and helping on the farm in summer, till I was eighteen. My birthday came in June, and my mother began directly to make my new shirts. "Mother!" said I one day, "why did my father select Dartmouth for me?"

"Your father and his brother both were there, and his folks lived in the neighborhood" answered my mother.

"I never knew my father had a brother," said I, surprised.

"My mother started, and looked trouble. Then she said, impressively "Amos, you must never mention the name to your father. He never has spoken his brother's name since he moved out here, and he will not allow me to do so. You were named for your uncle, but then it was your grandfather's name as well."

"But how did it happen?" I asked. "What was the cause of the quarrel? I suppose there was a quarrel?"

"A girl, of course!" said my mother, with a tone of bitterness very unusual with her. "Your father thought there was only one woman in the world, and that was Penelope Morrill; and she thought there was only one man in the world, and that was Abner Hoyt. I don't know how much she was to blame. My sister Abbey always took her part, and said Penelope was overpersuaded by her folks to say she would have Nathan. Anyhow, she broke off her engagement to your father and married Abner. Then your father married me, and we moved out here. That is all I know."

"Did Uncle Abner have any family?" I asked, after a short silence.

"I believe he had. They moved away from the place, and both he and his wife died young. Abbey always kept up my friendship with Penelope; but I asked her never to say anything about them in her letters. When you are in Vermont, Amos, you must go to see Aunt Abbey."

"Well, I went to college, and, much to my delight, I entered in the Sophomore year. I got through my first two years with credit; and, in my second summer, determined to take Paulet in my way, and go to see Aunt Abbey. "Paulet is a very queer little place, with more up-and-downs, and wooded mountain sides, and running brooks, than any I saw before. Aunt Abbey lived in a tiny red house, just where the little Paulet river runs across the road, and turns, at almost a right angle to its former course. Just in front is a high rocky ledge, at the base of which the river flows for some distance and then directly under a high-arched bridge, pours down some thirty feet in a pretty little fall.

"Aunt Abbey gave me a warm welcome. She was a widow, much older than my mother, and lived in the little red house with her daughter Malvina, a prim, sensible old maid, with learning enough for a college professor. Of course we had everything to talk about; and I made acquaintance with a host of new people, both Hoyts and Marvins. I observed that almost everybody who called asked about Penelope, and the answer always was, that Penelope was over at Deacon Hoyt's, weaving.

"'Who is Penelope?' I asked, at last, of my cousin Malvina.

"'Oh, Penelope Winder! she's kind of adopted child of ours. She's an orphan; and when her step-father died she hadn't any home, and her mother was a great friend of ma's—so she naturally came to us. We would like to keep her with us all the time, but she has very independent feelings, Pen has, and likes to support herself. She's a splendid hand at all kinds of weaving, and folks send for her from near. But she makes her home with us, and as she is to come home Saturday, we'll hitch up sid bay, and go after her.

"I was pretty well disposed to like Penelope beforehand; and when you Deacon Ambler, who was the beau of the village, asked Malvina when Miss Winder was expected, I felt that he had taken an unwarrantable liberty. When I saw Penelope, I understood the reason. I felt at once that we were made for each other; and I have never changed my mind. In a week's time we were as well acquainted as if we had known each other for years, and in three weeks we were engaged."

"It was very imprudent in me!" said my mother-in-law, demurely; "I don't know how I came to do so."

"Nor I! I never could guess. Well, Aunt Abbey and Malvina both looked troubled when we told them of it.

"'I'm afraid it won't do, children,' said my aunt,—'I am indeed. Perhaps I ought to have foreseen and prevented it. You have heard of your uncle Abner?'

"'Mother mentioned him to me, once,' I replied; "but she cautioned me never to speak of him to father.'

"'Just so. I was afraid it would be the way,' said Aunt Abbey. 'How folks can be inveterate, I don't know. Well Penelope here, is your uncle's only child. You see her mother married again after his death. She was left kind of forlorn with this baby, and I asked her to come and stay the winter with me. Old Major Winder he took a great fancy to her, and—well, I suppose it was natural enough.'

"'Natural for some folks,' said Malvina, with emphasis.

"'Well, anyhow, the old man was good to her, and gave she money for education. But, you see, he never made a will. I used to talk to him about it, but he always said he meant to provide for Penelope. But he was taken suddenly one day, and the daughter by the first marriage, who never could abide Penelope, got the mother.'

"'Yes, anybody else, but poor Penelope,' interrupted Penelope. 'I never could understand how she could be Father Winder's daughter.'

"'Oh, she wasn't much like him, that's plain; for a sweeter tempered creature never lived, continued my aunt, 'I don't know how she took everything. You know how she worked to get your boy over mother's death. However, she did get over it, and she came to me. When her year was up, I did write a letter to your father, and invited Penelope; but she wouldn't come. I never dared let you know about Penelope. I never thought it was in human nature to be so patient and cruel as your father was. Well, I understood the reason. I felt at once that we were made for each other; and I have never changed my mind. In a week's time we were as well acquainted as if we had known each other for years, and in three weeks we were engaged.'

"'It was very imprudent in me!' said my mother-in-law, demurely; "I don't know how I came to do so."

"'
