MONDAY EVENING, NOV. 23.

Correspondence.

THE MEDICAL CONTROVERSY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE DAILY NEWS.

Sir,—I consider personal quarrels as unfit for newspaper publication as I do notices of surgical operations, and the chief object I have in replying to Dr. Maclean's letter of the 19th inst. is to correct misapprehensions, which in the excitement produced by his perusal of my remarks, seem to have taken possession of his mind. He says that pity for me was the effect produced on him by reading my article, and I say sorrow is the effect produced on me by reading his. Sorrow that he so far misconstrued my statements as to proceed upon the assumption that I was endeavouring to injure his standing among his patients and friends here, to detract from his intelligence and moral worth, or to deny his surgical skill and professional position. I would not do any of these things, unless correcting the abuses I pointed out would do so.

If any man were to tell me that Dr. Maclean is not a good surgeon I should inform him that he was mistaken, as I have done repeatedly; but at the same time, if I were informed that Dr. Maclean's operations were advertised in a newspaper I should as conscientiously say that it was a flagrant breach of medical etiquette, and one that should be condemned. It is because he occupies a high position that we notice his acts the more, expecting from great men, good examples, believing with Shakespeare, that

"Bad actions that in men seem little things
"Increase by station and are great in kings."

The only error in this matter that I could be convinced of, if error it can be called, is putting my strictures in the public print, instead of bringing the subject before his notice by a private letter.

But when I reflected that the un-professional acts complained of had occurred twice in one year, and that his attention had been called to one of them at least, that the reports were in my opinion given in a boasting sort of way, and exaggerated, that Dr. Maclean, although a professior of surgery in an American medical school for one part of the year, was a practising surgeon in Kingston for another part, and was therefore amenable to our code, (for I did not then know that he contemplated severing his connection with this city forever) that such publications formed a bad example for young men entering the medical profession, and for other men in it who might want a precedent for advertising, that it was no more unjust to show the public that these operations were frequently performed, and that they had been done about Kingston and could be again, than it was to inform the public that Dr. Maclean could do them, and that publishing my views in the newspaper was the most effectual means of calling attention to the objectionable practice with a view to its entire suppression, I decided that the course I took was the best one.

The Dr. has in his reply denied having had any hand in procuring the publication of the notices complained of, and admits that "they were in very bad taste;" hence it would be unjust in me to dispute his assertions, although the increased boastfulness of the contents of his letter of the 19th might raise in my mind some doubts of his sincerity. We shall for the present assume, however, that there is no diversity of opinion between us on the impropriety of the matter, and here any further discussion must end with him as far as I am concerned.

When an educated gentleman becomes so uncontrolably angry because the propriety of certain acts that seem to be his are called in question, that he attempts the annihilation of him who calls attention to the subject by the reiterated use of such epithets as "cowardly, dishonest, dastardly, shallow and dishonest, an insignificant member of the medical profession, mentally, morally and physically worthless," &c. I must leave him in the hands of an intelligent public, for I can enter upon no such personalities with him.

With reference to one of his statements I may remark, more particularly, that my article is so far from being a "cowardly" or "dastardly" attack when his back was turned, as he is pleased to term it, that it was published in the same paper that contained his objectionable notice, that it was done in Kingston, amongst his numerous friends, as he himself acknowledges, with a full certainty that he would see it in a short time, and have the privilege, which he has so abundantly exercised, of replying to it if he thought proper, that it was not whispered about slanderously, for some days, to gather force by repetition, but openly made as soon as the article appeared which called it forth. And I may further remark that I am not criticising his personal qualities or professional attainments, nor am I giving vent to any pent up [illegible] he seems to think; I am aiming to correct that habit of newspaper puffing, which is too common in this country, and which that last notice referred to brought so prominently [illegible]; not labouring to injure his standing among his patients as he avers, but to improve his standing among his professional brethren; not dealing with surgical skill and accomplishments, but with the Ethics of the medical profession.

If we have established principles in this matter to guide each one in his conduct toward the profession as a whole, let us all acknowledge them and submit to their requirements unanimously; or else let us disregard them entirely, and take to advertising our cures and operations in imitation of the quacks and charlatans.

We can now scarcely open a number of the Canada Lancet without perceiving complaints from some unassuming brother in the profession, of undue advantages being taken of him through the advertising habits of some other brother whose sense of moral rights, to say nothing of professional etiquette, is not as refined as it should be; and if we do not as a profession unite to discountenance such practices, very soon the man possessed of the greatest
