EFFECT OF ADVERTISING.—It is amusing at times to observe the stores of the merchants who don't advertise; to see the anxious proprietors looking into the streets and see the people go by, wondering why they don't come in, while the stores of their neighbours who do advertise are thronged with customers. Some people will learn by observation, others will not.—Daily Palladium.

RAPPE, WEBER, & Co.,

MANUFACTURERS OF

GRAND OVERSTRUNG SQUARE

PIANOS,

Corner of King & Princess Streets

KINGSTON, ONTARIO.

RAPPE, WEBER, & Co. announce to the Public that they are now in possession of facilities for manufacturing Pianos unsurpassed, if equalled, by any in the Dominion.

The members of the Firm are Practical Piano Makers, and are anxious to establish their success in manufacturing enterprise by careful workmanship rather than by mere speculation. They are able skilfully to superintend every department, and are prepared to guarantee every instrument they sell.

For strength of manufacture and materials, beauty of finish, and durability and excellence of tone, they challenge the Dominion to produce superior instruments; and while they claim for their work every excellence that can be expected from skillful and enterprising workmen, they beg to announce that their resources are sufficiently ample to enable them to compete in prices with any speculator in Pianos.

The Subscribers keep no Travelling Agent. All orders addressed to the Subscribers, or sent through any respectable Music Dealer, will receive attention. Orders through mail will be attended to as if selected in person.

Who is Mrs. Winslow?

As this question is frequently asked, we will simply say that she is a lady who, for upwards of thirty years, has untiringly devoted her time and talents as a female Physician and nurse, principally among children. She has especially studied the constitution and wants of this numerous class, and as a result of this effort, and practical knowledge, obtained in a lifetime spent as nurse and physician, she has compounded a Soothing Syrup for children teething. It operates like magic—giving rest and health, and is, moreover, sure to regulate the bowels. In consequence of this article Mrs Winslow is becoming world-renowned as a benefactor of her race; children certainly do rise up and bless her; especially is this the case in this city. Vast quantities of the Soothing Syrup are daily sold and used here. We think Mrs Winslow has immortalized her name by this invaluable article, and we sincerely believe thousands of children have been saved from an early grave by its timely use, and that millions yet unborn will share its benefits, and unite in calling her blessed. No woman has discharged her duty to her suffering little one, in our opinion, until she has given it the benefit of Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup. Try it, mothers—TRY IT NOW.—Ladies' Visitor, New York City.

Sold by all druggists. 25 cents a bottle.

Be sure and call for

"Mrs Winslow's Soothing Syrup,"

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS.

The evidence which has been taken before the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Telegraphs Bill furnishes an interesting history of the origin of that important measure, the objects which it seeks to accomplish, and the defects which it is intended to remedy. As far back as 1854 a scheme for placing the telegraphs under the control of the Government was broached by Mr Allan, an electrician, but it was not until seven years afterwards that the proposed transfer to the State was brought under notice of the Post-office authorities. In 1861 a memorandum was prepared by Mr Ricardo, then chairman of the Electric and International Company, showing the expediency of transferring the telegraphic communication of the kingdom to the Government. At that time, however, Mr Scudamore, the assistant-secretary to the Post-office, was so occupied in arranging the details of the Savings Banks Bill, that he laid the paper aside, and the question slumbered for four years. In 1865 the subject was revived by the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce, and, on being supported by almost all the Chambers in the kingdom, it was taken up in earnest by the Post-office authorities. The points urged by the Chambers of Commerce were that the existing charges for transmission of messages were too high; many places and districts were unprovided with facilities for telegraphic communication; that in many of the places to which the telegraph had reached the office was inconveniently remote from the centre of business and population, and open for too small a portion of the day; that in the countries where the telegraphs were under the control of the State, lower rates and a widely extended system prevailed; and that in the United Kingdom like results would follow the adoption of like means.

With the sanction of Lord Stanley of Alderley, the Postmaster-General of that day, Mr Scudamore, communicated with the Governments of many foreign countries, and the replies received conclusively showed that in every case where a reduction in price had been made there was an immediate increase in the number of messages transmitted. As to the points urged by the Chambers respecting the high charges of the present system, and the inconvenient situations of many telegraph offices, Mr Scudamore furnished many illustrations. It is well known that the greater number of the telegraph offices are, and have long been, at railway stations, and that the cost of sending the messages is very frequently increased by the charge for porterage which alone can secure its delivery. The prices have often been simply prohibitory of telegraphic communication. Even with this high tariff it has been impossible for the sender to depend upon the speedy transmission and delivery of the message for which he has paid so dearly. At 223 railway stations, where the officials work the telegraph, the public have been warned that the "station master is permitted by the railway company to send and receive messages to oblige residents, but as his duties are manifold, expedition in the transmission of messages cannot always be relied upon."

The defects of the present system having been admitted, how do the Post-office authorities propose to remedy them? In the first place they have opened a large number of money order offices with direct regard to the requirements of the population. They are always in the centre of the town which they serve, and one is established wherever there is an expectation that twelve orders a week will be issued. They flourish thickly in our crowded cities, and they may be found dotted over the United Kingdom amid the calm retreats of rural life. At the end of last year no fewer than 3,700 money order offices had been opened; this was in the proportion of one to every 1,450 inhabited houses, and the number is constantly increasing. It is only necessary to mention these figures, and to contrast them with the fact that at 1,300 out of 2,000 places in England and Wales there is no telegraph station within the town limits, to show the enormous facilities the Post-office possesses for multiplying telegraphic communication. This is further illustrated when we add that, independently of the 3,700 money order offices, there are about 19,000 receptacles for letters, half of which are pillar-boxes, and half are receiving offices. The proportion is one to every 300 inhabited houses. These receptacles are cleared at fixed and known hours of the day, and the Post-offices could give to the public the advantage of depositing in them telegraphic messages written on stamped paper, with the certainty that they would, at a certain hour, be taken from the receptacles, carried without delay to the nearest telegraph office, and immediately transmitted to their destinations. To quote the evidence of Mr Scudamore before the Parliamentary Committee—"We should give every 1,450 inhabited houses a telegraph office in their centre, and we should give to every 300 houses a place of deposit from which the telegraphic message would be carried free of charge to them, at a fixed hour, to the place from which it would be taken by the wire." And as a great part of the Post-office business is necessarily transacted at night, a vast number of offices would thus remain open for the reception and transmission of messages, while under the existing system none but the more important stations are open after a stated hour in the evening. The price at which the Postoffice proposes to transmit messages is a uniform shilling rate for twenty words, irrespective of distance, and excluding the address of the sender and the recipient.

When, on the 1st instant the promoters appeared before the House of Commons Committee, they were confronted by a formidable array of counsel representing vested rights and interests. Gradually the opposition melted away, and arrangements were made first with the inland telegraph companies, next the railways, and then the submarine cable proprietors were arranged with. The basis of the agreements, subject to the approval of Parliament, was the purchase of existing interests by a payment of twenty times the present net revenue, the amount to be ascertained by competent arbitrators. Mr Scudamore's extreme figure for the purchase is £6,000,000, and even on the supposition that reduced charges and increased facilities will cause no addition to the number of telegrams now transmitted, the
