GLANDERS.

Horrible Death of a Man Afflicted with the Disease

The Arthur Enterprise says: A shocking case of glanders, resulting in the death of a man named Frank Curl, aged about 30 years, occurred a little over a week ago in Luther. The unfortunate man had been employed by Hathaway's mill, and having cracks upon his hands, it is supposed he caught the contagion through the handling of some hoards upon which horses affected with the disease had discharged the fatal poison from their nostrils. It is said there is no other way by which the infection could gave been communicated, as the man had nothing to do with horses. We have been informed the whole body of the old disease man presented a frightful appearance, the last medical aid was of no avail, and he died in great agony on Monday, the 17th of July. Curl was a married man, and leaves a widow to mourn his untimely death. His father and mother went to Bad River some time ago, and are at present at the last country. Persons having horses affected with glanders incur a fearful responsibility in keeping such animals more publicly when they make use of them in a way to endanger the lives of persons unacquainted with the fatal effects of the loathsome and terrible disease. It is a notorious fact that persons have been found as weaked and unprincipled as to dispose of animals so affected, even to a value of the law which ordains that they be destroyed. Persons of this class are on better than murderers, and should meet the severest punishment allowed to be inflicted.

Styles for Windows.

With the architectural revival of stained glass effects in the windows, certain manufacturers have had a new field opening to them for the outlet of Madrapatian goods, which were formerly used in the windows of cathedral windows, wherein color, squares, and geometric subjects were introduced, and yellow, orange, green, yellows, browns, and other sombre tints, going to the windows which they are being used in, and folds in wrinkles, an excellent stained glass effect.

The opportunities and possibilities of window decorations embody and combine many of principles, all of which are unknown to us. There is a growing demand for more colour and tone of the Italian Renaissance, and classic to lace curtains, and in these and other certain we are prepared to pick the demand represented during the next six months for the space of colour and relief from the many years prevalence of white goods. The tendency of the market has pointed this way for some years back, in the constantly growing demand of cretonne and cream tints.

There can be no laws of interior decoration written other than the laws of good taste, which must be intuitive to be appreciated. Heavy curtains should be confined to large rooms. Nothing of curtains of this kind. For the reason simply that in the use are the atmosphere becomes dense and heavy with heavy fabric impeding the circulation of draughts, and in the latter the recognized upholsterer upholsterer is regarded as an indispensable fact, but there is no accordance to proper methods of lace curtains, therefore, have always been used for their popularities of convenience, which allows the unskilled administrator of air.

In all while recognizing the adaptability of lace goods for windows, much may be said upon the character of the fabric used, so as to avoid a style of goods which is not in its location. With the opening of the fall trade an extensive assortment of Madras curtains will drift into retail stores, and unless artistically applied great demonstration will be felt with them, and the sale of them be brought summarily to a close.

In Memoriam.

Sudden are our moments of kindness
To which the coffin on the way,
Six months has gone, no human tongue
Canon where the stranger's bones lie—Poe.

The Clinton and Goderich papers record the finding of the body of an aged man, whom no one could identify, on the south road near Bluff, but from the description given of him, and a letter found in his pocket, there is not the slightest doubt but that he was an old gentleman named Thomas Clark, well known to many in Kingston and its vicinity. Mr Clark was an Englishman who came to Canada over forty years ago, and at the time of his death was seventy nine years of age, and when a young man was a corn merchant in London. Why he left England and spent the rest of his life wandering aimlessly through Canada is unknown to the most intimate of his acquaintance. He received a remittance from England every three months, but from what source no one in Canada know, he was unmarried and followed no regular business. He was a great reader of books, and his personal manners and pleasing address gained him from strangers interest at being affected in a manner to the highest sense of the term who did have filial sympathy any gender. He had for equals and superiors as a gentleman. He visited the vicinity of Kingston every year, stopping at the houses of James and William Atkinson and Thomas Cross for weeks at a time, partly from age and partly by sight, but always welcome visitor, and that he should be found dead in a Canadian wilderness and be buried in an unknown grave will be sad news to all who were acquainted with him. Indeed many will be inclined to think that he met with foul usage, or perhaps murder, for the sum of money he had in his possession, but the fields in wrinkles, an excellent stained glass effect.

The opportunities and possibilities of window decorations embody and combine many of principles, all of which are unknown to us. There is a growing demand for more colour and tone of the Italian Renaissance, and classic to lace curtains, and in these and other certain we are prepared to pick the demand represented during the next six months for the space of colour and relief from the many years prevalence of white goods. THE LIGHT OF THE FUTURE.

Will Gas Retain Its Place The Electric Light Outdone.

A late number of the Paris Figaro contains a lengthy article describing a remarkable invention which has just been made in Paris by which ordinary gas is made to give a light equal if not superior to the electric light itself. The invention in itself is said to be simple and is due to Mr Clamond, a gentleman of the highest scientific attainments have already been made, and lately 150 gentlemen, mostly all men of the highest order of scientific attainments witnessed the exhibition of the invention in Paris and pronounced it highly satisfactory. The gas used was the ordinary gas supplied to the city and with the aid of a magnesium safety lamp and a burner of a peculiar kind, the light is produced, and it is said to be far more brilliant and vivid than the electric light. The light is produced without any danger, and the electric light are dispensed with altogether as well as the complicated machinery used in connection with the electric light lamp. It is claimed that by this process it is rendered practically of gas light and that the light is far more powerful than the electric light, and that the light is far more powerful than the electric light, and that the light is far more powerful than the electric light. The Clamond invention is said to be
