WATER-SPOUTS IN CALIFORNIA.

Terrible Phenomena in a Land Where There Was no Water.

A series of the most destructive water-spouts ever recorded ran over some portions of Kern, San Bernardino and Inyo counties on Friday, the 30th day of June. From the loss of destruction there must have been several of those fearful visitors. One of the greatest was discovered in the afternoon of that day about two miles west of Tejonite Holes, on the stage road between Caliente and Lone Pine, moving north. It was terrible in its work of destruction for 150 miles in extent. For nine miles it followed the line of the stage road, and swept it away completely. In places it plowed the track of the road 30 feet in depth. The early travelers of Kern county have seen a form of nature which they have named a tornado or water-spout, and have seen the results of such a visitation in the narrow Walker's Pass, leaving a line of destruction of 150 miles.

The scene, or another spout, south of Cajon, in 1862, swept across the line of the new Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, where a most startling spectacle was found. The water washed the road bed away, but the rails remained, and held the debris of the storm in miscellaneous confusion. Ties and timber arrested by the rails and iron were in great heaps, a large number of coyotes, jack rabbits, well-dressed, various kinds of snakes, about 500 of them rattlesnakes, many miles around the rails had been discouraged from being whitened any further and being killed by the flying mass of stones, timber and all manner of matter that was buried among by the restless storm.

About the same time, on the opposite side of the mountains, on the North Fork of the Kern River and Kernville, a water-spout came down and swept away a fine farm and covered the land with water. In Inyo there another similar storm came rushing to the place, destroying the little Indian village in Owens Lake, and then it passed on to Inyo, sweeping corn fields and vineyards, and drowning several of the Indians and killing many other men. The great dry plain for 20 miles north to Owens was scourched like a blast furnace, and swept away into the hot and thirsty air.

Already there appears to be found the traces of four of these dreadful and wonderful storms that move from south to north. As they all come from a part, the country where there is no water, the question naturally arises, where do the water come from? Is it true, as some the floors say that the water is in a body, as the lake bed instantly turns to the south? Which lake is meant? If any, speak? The only lake that is known to Owens River which is dry is one well known to everybody who ever traveled over the road from Owens River to Los Angeles. It is a lake of alkali, and it is a lake of water, which is dry, and which is dry, and which is dry, and
