THE DAILY NEWS.

VOLUME XVIII. KINGSTON, (CANADA), FRIDAY EVENING, APRIL 23, 1869. NUMBER 168.

NIGHT IN A STORM.

In a private parlour of a hotel in the City. Two men sat at a well spread table. The younger had just pushed from the table with an impatient exclamation.

He said, abruptly, "I cannot eat, nor drink. If I believed in presentiments I should say I felt a warning of something unpleasant, if not horrible."

"Pshaw, my dear nephew," said the other, "you do not believe in such things. Make yourself comfortable and enjoy your breakfast. You are not to start for Montreal, say what you know." The young man arose from his seat and stood at the window, throwing it open and looking into the frosty, brilliant sunshine. The air was intensely cold and reddened his face painfully. He drew in his head, saying, "It is colder this morning. There's going to be a storm, and I must go. Will you come with me to the station? The train leaves in an hour."

The other shivered and drew his dressing gown closer.

"No, no, said, "I'll not leave the house while I am obliged to. I did not leave England when you were so sentimentally frozen by a Canadian winter. Alice will not thank you for coming sooner. Women don't like a man around when the wedding preparations are going on, no matter how much they love him. Take my advice and stay until the time appointed for you to meet her."

Russell, the young man addressed, replied with bare civility to his companion's advice. What was such advice in comparison with the urgent cries of his whole being? He had left England three weeks before to claim the woman of his choice. He had been three weeks in Montreal, where she had emigrated with her parents, and he knew her love and promise of marriage. She believed with utter devotion in her uncle and adopted father had accepted him, and now sat smiling at the idea, the whims of youth.

"There is a storm in the air in spite of the sun," Russell said, still standing by the window. "I should not enjoy being caught in by snow on my journey."

"Pshaw, man! but you might as well expect a change of climate."

"I shall take Alice back to England if possible," Russell said, with his hand on the door. "Good bye uncle, then, for a time."

He was soon speeding from the town, looking eagerly forward over the drifts of snow as if he would outstrip the steam which bore him.

He was not half through his journey by daylight from the west, where it had lingered throughout the sunny morning, rose like a white veil that is the herald of storm. Otherwise people looked out of their windows and shook their heads, saying, "It will be a hard one. It's just a year ago this terrible storm that blockaded us."

The traveller, looking, felt his face grow pallid with fear as his hopes, his youthful energies, sank.

"We fear the storm while on the road lest they would get to their destination before the storm would be sufficient to retard them much. But he had still the 20 miles he must go in a sleigh from the last station, for Alice waited at the residence of a relative beyond the village. Her aunt had persuaded her to be married there, where wealth could lend splendor to the ceremony, and what girl could withstand an invitation.

"Alice was not in Montreal!" murmured he, and the first few flakes began slowly downward.

The air was filled with the sharp particles of an older instead of warmer, or rather, for the wind rose and whirled furiously.

It moved two hours when Russell reached the station in Montreal. It was said sure that the gloom was mitigated in the drawing room.

He was half benumbed by cold and sitting, but he could not wait. Rendezvous was a day early, and might be in the city until to-morrow; but that morbid haste urged him on impossible for him to rest quiet a moment.

A few moments by the bright drawing room. Then he decided the house occupied by Alice's parents.

At the house he learned with surprise that Alice had left two or three days before. Oppressed with fearful suspense, he turned on, taking the road the servant supposed her driver had taken. He emerged into the open country, the cutter sank deep in the drifts. The horses struggled desperately through the drifts, while the blinding and benumbing cold almost overpowered him. To arouse himself from the lethargy that was the precursor of death, he stepped out of the sleigh and walked beside it. For hours it seemed he travelled, alternately walking and driving the animals he drove being almost exhausted.

Suddenly, with a snort of surprise or fear, the horses stopped and threw up their heads, their eyes staring in their sockets, seemingly indistinct in the gloom of the storm.

A something infecting in the alarm of the horses, and Russell felt his cheeks blanch and his heart slowly forward, leaving the sleigh and standing there.

He felt the first chill of an impending danger, shook the young man as he was about to leave, and a cutter overturned in the snow. He was upon it before he could make a step. There was no horse attached. He saw at a glance—but the traces, were fastened there. The horses had blown away from one side of the road, while the other side was deep with drifts. He leaped upon the runner, and hastily pulled the buffalo robes from the cutter. There came upon him such as he had never before.

It seemed to him so long, though it was but a moment—in that snowy cutter, with the pallid face of a woman, motionless among her furs.

The piercing cry he lifted that beautiful head upon his shoulder, and sat down on the seat, kissing his lips to the cold ones that did not respond to his caress. And there he sat—a faint breath just stirred his cheek.

Was it thus he had thought to greet his promised wife? He could not think—he knew nothing but that he had found Alice—and his whole being rose to the resolve that he would save her—that neither snow nor ice nor cold should take her from him. She was his, and he claimed her despite everything.

But he could not linger there; he must be moving on, though ever so slowly. He bore his burden to his own cutter, taking with him the furs that could not save her after that fearful sleep had begun. His horses walked on again—they needed no guiding—they could find their way better than man could direct.

Anything but intense love would have despaired in that tempest of snow, with that pitiless wind freezing across the earth, raising no glow on the blue white face against his own.

He roughly chafed with snow her hands and face; but he soon saw that severer measures must be tried; that the lethargy was too deep. She dimly felt the fierce friction, for she moaned and seemed to shrink from it—a wordless request to be left alone.

Russell had forgotten the cold for himself, the snow swept by him unheeded. Again he lifted her in his arms and stepped out into the snow, letting her stand beside him, then trying to make her fight her own way on, knowing that if she could once be aroused she was saved.

At first she fell down helplessly, sank inanimately with no wish to stir. But in a moment his ceaseless efforts had some effect, and he could compel her to use her muscles slightly, though her head drooped in an unknowing stupour.

Russell felt that he had never suffered before. He thought the pain and sorrows of all his life were crowded into that one night. By slow degrees, almost hopelessly slow, consciousness and horrible suffering returned.

His face was pale and sick, as he knew the agonies she endured. But pain was the signal of life, and not now would he despair.

At last she looked at him with recognizing eyes, and when everything else had failed, love reached the fountain of crimson, and sent a wave of its red to her face.

Weak, suffering, she reclined upon his arm, unable to move or to speak. Could he keep the life he had saved through a much longer journey?

When he left the city there were a few houses scattered by the road side for two or three miles. The dim glimmer of their lights he had seen; but since then he had noticed nothing—it was a waste through which he was riding, with no lamp of hope held out to him. And the delicate girl, but half resuscitated, he thought—oh, how many miles before safety?

A half hour passed, and through Russell's brave soul had already darted the first doubt, human endurance could not last forever, and it was more than he could do to preserve the feeble life he had recalled. In another half hour ice and cold might conquer him. He would die with her; he could not live when that dear face was beneath the sod.

A quarter of a mile further on, and he saw through the storm a dark object by the roadside. It was a building of some kind, and it could shelter them. He turned his horses' heads that way, and plunged through the snow to the door. There was no door. It was a dismantled log hut, with its door gone, and its one little window broken out. But it was better than the fury without, and in another five minutes Alice was sheltered from the wind. With painful and patient fumbling he succeeded in fastening the buffalo skin in front of the doorway, thus forming an insufficient barrier. Then he drew from his pocket his cigar case and his matches, and lighting one of the latter, looked eagerly round the room, in the flickering light. That glance told him that there was an immense fire-place at one side of the hut, and a divine light streamed into his soul at the sight.

As his horses had dragged the cutter to the house, the runner had grated over the top rail of a fence, and the unseen post had nearly upset the light cutter.

The white-fingered, fair-faced Englishman worked with a power that was more like fury, and when at last a ruddy blaze flew up the broad chimney, tears of joy actually started from his eyes.

Exhausted, happy, he knelt at the feet of Alice, and with his face in her hands. With that reviving warmth came a little of strength to her weary soul. She leaned forward, a smile upon her lips, and in her eyes, and murmured—

"It was heaven itself who sent you here, Robert."

Two hours later, a grey dawn was struggling through the clouds; a broad strip of blue encircled the west; the wind moaned in lower tones. The old hut was golden with the wood-fire—it threw its radiance over the two horses that had been led in and stood wild and grateful in a corner, staring at the fire.

Renovated, though weak, with a happiness beyond words, warm in heart, Alice Malcolm greeted her wedding day. She had told her story to Robert—the story of her desertion in the snow. As the storm had come on more furiously, her driver, whom she believed trustworthy, announced his intention of returning.

She had discovered that he was in a semi-intoxicated state, but she refused to return; and he would not go a step farther, and had cut the traces, and mounting one of the horses left her to her fate.

She did not know when she spoke that a mile back, within a few miles of the city, he lay frozen to death, the eddying snow drifting over his body. He had found a fate which his mistress had escaped.

Backward, through a vista of happy years, looked Russell and his wife to that night of horror in Canada, when a peril revealed to them the full depth of their devotion—the infinitude of their love.

Thomas Davies, a journeyman printer in Pittsburg, Pa., went home Saturday night at a late hour, very drunk, and feeling sick attempted to vomit out of a third storey window, but lost his balance and fell out. He alighted on a wash-tub and broke both his legs and his collar-bone.

An inventive young woman of Chicago advertises that she will "give lessons in etiquette, and the way of conversing with the ladies, to any young gentleman who does not feel at ease in the society of the opposite sex. Tuition of lovers extra."

Among the aristocratic equestrians in Hyde Park, London, recently, was a man carefully got up as a "girl of the period," who rode on a side-saddle and acted the part of a woman to perfection. Singularly enough, the police took no notice of him, although he made his appearance daily for upwards of a week.

VERY NATURAL.—When a person has proved an article and found it good, and answering the purpose for which it is intended, he will not really abandon it for one of doubtful reputation, or concerning which he knows nothing. We are led to make these remarks owing to the course always pursued by those who have used that celebrated and truly valuable horse medicine known as "Darley's Condition Powders and Arabian Heave Remedy." All are so well pleased with it that they will not use any other; many have waited several weeks until the agent could obtain a new supply. There is nothing equal to it as a condition medicine, or for any complaint affecting the wind of horses. Remember the name, and see that the signature of Hurd & Co. is on each package. Northrop & Lyman, Newcastle, Ont., proprietors for Canada. Sold by all Medicine Dealers.

Philosophy of Marriage.

A new Course of Lectures, as delivered at the New York Museum of Anatomy embracing the subjects:—How to live and what to live for; Youth, Maturity, and old Age; Manhood generally reviewed; The cause of indigestion; Flatulence and Nervous Diseases accounted for; Marriage philosophically considered, &c., &c. TWO QUESTIONS EASILY ANSWERED.—Why should men wear beards? Because they are a great protection to the throat and lungs, and add much to their personal appearance. Why should we use "Bryan's Pulmonic Wafers?" Because when used for coughs, colds, tickling in the throat, hoarseness, &c., they act like a charm. Ministers and lawyers use them, physicians recommend them, and singers and public speakers say they are the very best medicine in existence for the cure of such complaints. Sold by all medicine dealers at 25 cts per box.

TWO TABLESPOONFULS of the Extract of Sarsaparilla, added to a pint of water, is equal to the Lisbon Diet Drink, and one bottle is equal to a gallon of the Syrup of Sarsaparilla, or the decoctions as usually made.

AN INTERESTING LETTER is published in the Medico-Chirurgical Review, on the subject of the Extract of Sarsaparilla in certain affections by Benjamin Travers, F.R.S., &c. Speaking of these diseases, and diseases arising from the excess of mercury, he states that no remedy is equal to the Extract of Sarsaparilla; its power is extraordinary, more so than any other drug I am acquainted with. It is, in the strictest sense, a tonic, with this invaluable attribute, that it is applicable to a state of the system so sunken, and yet so irritable, as renders other substances of the tonic class unavailable or injurious.

NEW STYLES OF TYPE HAVE been added to the DAILY NEWS JOB PRINTING OFFICE. Our two Steam Presses and Automatic Platen Printing Machinery enable us to turn out work in good style, with quick despatch, and at cheap rates. Inquiry is solicited.

TRANSIENT ADVERTISEMENTS.—The large circulation of the DAILY NEWS renders it the natural medium for the publication of all small and transient advertisements, as well as larger announcements. Advertisements of religious notices and Sabbath services; situations wanted; situations vacant; houses for sale; houses to rent; houses wanted; board and lodging; rooms wanted; board wanted; articles lost; articles found; cattle wanted; cattle for sale; cattle strayed, &c., when set close, inserted for 25c ents each insertion, payable only in advance. When displayed, a proportionate price will be charged.

EFFECT OF ADVERTISING.—It is amusing at times to observe the stores of the merchants who don't advertise; to see the anxious proprietors looking into the streets and see the people go by, wondering why they don't come in, while the stores of their neighbours who do advertise are thronged with customers. Some people will learn by observation, others will not.—Daily Palladium.
