THE MURDER AT TODMORDEN.

A murder of singular atrocity was committed on the night of the 2nd at the Parsonage House attached to the parish church of Todmorden. The inmates of the Parsonage were the Rev. Mr Plow, Mrs Plow (who was convalescent after confinement), a female nurse, and three domestic servants, one of whom (the nursery maid) is by the name of "Jane." Between 10 and 11 o'clock Mr Plow, who had returned home from a parochial visit, was preparing to go to bed, when he heard a violent kicking at the back door. On several previous occasions he had been annoyed in the night by a young man named Miles Ormerod, a check weaver, to whom he had reason to have given some offence by forbidding him in the house. Weatherhill (a rejected sweetheart in one of Mr Plow's female servants, who had been in consequence sent home to her friends near Todmorden) had dismissal Weatherhill had frequently threatened to have his revenge, and he had so pertinaciously annoyed Mr Plow by hanging about the place that a night watchman was engaged for a time to watch the house, and prevent him from prowling upon the grounds. Hearing the disturbance at the back door, Mr Plow suspected another visit from Weatherhill. He told the servants remain in the house while he himself went out of the front door to go round to the back door himself. On going round he saw Mr Weatherhill standing against the back door. The moment Weatherhill caught sight of Mr Plow he cut, with a hatchet he had in his hand, a cord which had fastened around the handle of the door to prevent the door from being opened from the inside. This done, he drew a pistol from his belt and snapped it at Mr Plow as the cap missed fire. He then struck Mr Plow on the head with the axe, unlatched the door, and dragged Mr Plow into the house. While Weatherhill was still dealing desperate blows with the axe the three female servants came to the assistance of their master. They seized Weatherhill by the hair, and so held him while Mr Plow, half stunned with blows, and staggering with loss of blood, escaped by the front door. One of the servants ran out at the same time to fetch assistance. Of the two other servants Weatherhill singled out the nursemaid Jane, whom he accused of "telling tales" about his sweetheart and himself, and whom he had previously threatened he would be revenged upon. After locking the hall door and fastening the back door he attacked the young woman with an axe, cutting her in a fearful manner that one of the blows nearly severed her hand from the wrist. The woman screaming into the dining-room, he endeavoured to close the door against Weatherhill by pressing against it as well as she was able. She was overpowered, and Weatherhill, contriving to insert his arm between the door and the lintel, shot her dead with a pistol. The women were now in the utmost terror, while Mr Plow cried out, "Where's my wife?" The doors of the Parsonage were closed at the front and the back, and no assistance was within hearing distance. At this stage of the tragedy, Mrs. Plow's face, looking over the bannisters down into the hall, saw Weatherhill re-loading his pistol. After looking for the axe (which he appeared to have mislaid) he went into the kitchen, and when he came out into the lobby the nurse saw he had a poker in one hand and a pistol in the other. He put out the gas in the lower rooms, and went upstairs, still taunting Mr Plow with the question about his "Sarah." He came out him at the bedroom door and tried to stop him, saying, "Those you have to deal with are downstairs," to which he replied, "I have finished them, but you needn't be afraid, for you've done me no harm." He then, with her on one side, went into the bedroom, and attacked Mrs Plow. He drew the bedclothes, fired a pistol at her as she lay, and, the shot not taking fire, he began to batter her about the head and face with the poker. In the end of the attack the parish clerk (George Whitehead) and two gentlemen whom the women who had escaped had called upon for assistance, and whom the surviving servant downstairs had let into the house on their appearance, seized Weatherhill with the poker in his hand, and so rescued Mrs Plow from imminent death. It was found that the bullet had passed through the bedding, the wadding remaining on the sheet. The pillow, with all the upper part of the bed, was covered with blood. Mr Plow, on escaping by the front door, went to the house of Mr Greenwood, the organist to the church. This house is about 50 yards from the Parsonage. At that time Mr Plow had a pistol in his hand. The cap had been snapped, but the pistol had not been discharged. Before Mr Plow could tell all that had occurred he fainted through loss of blood. Mr D. N. Cockcroft, the surgeon to the family, was sent for, and the wounds were dressed. There were two large scalp wounds, one on the top and the other at the back of the head. There was also a deeply-cut vertical wound between the nipples. There were several lesser wounds and contusions about the face and body, and the left ear was torn from top to bottom.

The rev. gentleman was conveyed to the Parsonage, where he and Mrs. Plow now remain, both of them being in a very critical state. Mrs. Plow is a daughter of the Rev. Dr. Molesworth, vicar of Rochdale, and patron of the incumbency of the church of Todmorden.

Of Weatherhill, it is said that he had left home on Friday and Sunday in visiting his friends in York, and it is supposed that he knew he returned to Todmorden with the intention of perpetrating his crime. He bought the axe on Monday at the shop of an ironmonger named William Schofield, who has been suspended. It is the one he sold to him. The purchase excited no suspicion in Mr. Schofield's mind, as Weatherhill, who was well known in Todmorden, was thought to be a young man of good character and conduct. He used to teach in the Sunday school, and it was by means acquainted with his sweetheart, then in service at the Parsonage. After his arrest in Mrs. Plow's house, when he was being taken downstairs, he seemed to have quite recovered his composure, and showed a remarkable degree of coolness. He took a pipe from his pocket, saying, "I may as well have a smoke; I suppose it is the last I shall have, for what I've done I shall swing for." One of the persons who had him in custody was Mr Joseph Gleddill, formerly a schoolmaster, to whom the prisoner now said, "I was one of your pupils, Mr Gleddill, and you thought me a good grammarian, but you didn't think I should come to this." Astonished at his coolness, another of those present asked him if he was aware he had killed the housemaid, to which he replied, "Aye, she's got a couple of bullets in her, for there were two in every pistol." He repeatedly said they had no need to hold him, as he had no wish to escape, and would go quietly to the police station. He said, "I wish to harm nobody who hasn't harmed me." This conversation took place in the kitchen, and the prisoner, as if possessed by a mania for destruction, kicked over the kitchen table with his foot, and had to be restrained from committing further violence. On being subsequently taken to the police station and searched he was found to be wearing a belt, tied behind with a piece of cord, and apparently made for the purpose he was about to execute. There were four slit-holes in it, in which he carried the pistols. It seems, on a comparison of the statements of the several witnesses, that he must have had four pistols. Two were found at the rear of the Parsonage (where they probably fell during the struggle with Mr Plow), a third was wrested from him by Mr Plow in the lobby, and with the fourth he shot the housemaid, and reloaded it before going up stairs to attack Mrs Plow. On a further search the police found in his pocket a quantity of gunpowder, a lot of bullets and caps, and some loose shot. He himself assisted the police in the search, and produced voluntarily a photograph of the young woman he called "his Sarah," and also a portion of a link of a jet necklet. The links appeared to have been, broken in two, half being probably retained by Weatherhill and the other by his sweetheart as a "love token." When the money he had in his possession was being taken from him, he expressed a wish it might be given to his mother, with whom he lived, and whom he seemed now to remember suddenly. He said to the constable, "Let's have an understanding about this money—let's see how much there is." The amount was 17s. 5½d. He then said, "Please tell mother what has happened, and tell her as kindly as possible. Say I shan't be home to-night." He appeared to be under the impression that he had caused the death of Mr and Mrs. Plow, as well as of the housemaid. Referring to this, he said. "I've done all I wanted to do. I'm only sorry the d—d pistols did not go off better."

There is nothing to show that Weatherhill quarrelled with his sweetheart when he visited her at York. On the other hand the photograph and piece of jet he had in his possession point to the opposite conclusion, though, in the view, of the case, supposing him to have hoped to marry the young woman, in seems inexplicable he should find in mere revenge a motive for his deed. Nor is there any evidence that he was not perfectly sober at the time.

An inquest was subsequently held, and evidence elicited in accordance with the above facts. The jury found a verdict of wilful murder against the prisoner, who did not seem at all moved when he heard it. Whilst the jurors were signing the inquisition, he wished to make a statement.

The coroner repeated the caution he had previously given, that anything the prisoner might say would be used as evidence against him.

The prisoner then advanced to the table, and said: I have only got a few words to say, for I think the worst has come to the worst. Had Mr Plow given me the privilege I once asked of him, I should have now been a religious and devout Christian. I should have been a teacher in yonder school (indicating one which could be seen from the window of the room), and a communicant of the church, for I never would have taken that holy feast to make a mock of it; and I should have been on the way to heaven instead of to destruction. I hope Mr and Mrs Plow will forgive me, and I hope God will

The prisoner sobbed during the latter part of his remarks, but the traces of emotion soon passed away.

The coroner finally committed him for trial at the ensuing Manchester Assizes; but he is retained in the lock-up at Todmorden until the inquiry by the magistrate is completed.

INCREASE OF THE BRITISH SHIPPING TRADE.

The London Times of the 3rd instant publishes the following important report of the progress of the shipping trade of Great Britain:—In the year 1867 shipping to the amount of 13,340,717 tons was entered inwards at ports of the United Kingdom with cargoes in the trade with ports beyond the seas, an increase of 64,824 tons over the amount of the previous year. The British and British colonial shipping, 9,355,459 tons, showed an increase of 141,160 tons; the foreign, 3,985,258 tons, showed a decrease of 76,336 tons. The clearances outwards in the year amounted to 10,586,370 tons of British and colonial shipping—an increase of 634,649 tons; and 4,261,247 tons of foreign shipping—an increase of 206,002 tons, making the total clearances 14,847,617 tons, being an increase of 840,651 tons over the previous year. The arrivals in 1867 from the British possessions amounted to 5,651,761 tons, a decrease of 222,386 tons as compared with the previous year; the arrivals from foreign countries amounted to 10,688,956 tons, an increase of 287,210 tons. The departures to British possessions amounted to 2,874,238 tons, an increase of 228,388 tons over the previous year; and the departures to foreign countries amounted to 11,973,379 tons, an in- of 612,243 tons. The grand total of arrivals and departures in the year 1867 amounts to 96,358 vessels of 28,188,334 tons, being an increase of 261 vessels and 905,275 tons over the amount in the previous year. The British and British colonial shipping employed comprized 57,146 vessels of 19,166,020 tons in 1866, and 58,103 vessels of 19,941,829 tons in 1867; the foreign shipping, 88,951 vessels of 8,116,839 tons in 1866, and 38,255 vessels of 8,246,500 tons in 1867, These statements include only ves sels with cargoes; repeated voyages are, of course, counted.

The Watertown Reformer tells a story of a couple who started from that place, during the the recent storm to go to Oneida to get married. The train got stuck in the snow, near Pierrepoint Manor, and they were in a "tight fix." The passengers advised them to get married at that place; the bride demurred for some time, but finally gave in to necessity, and they were "spliced," waited till the road was dug out, and went on their way rejoicing.

GIANT POWDER.

A new explosive has been discovered by Prof. Nobel, the discoverer of nitro-glycerine. The new explosive is called Dynamite or Giant Powder. This, instead of being an oily liquid, liable to leak from the vessel in which it is confined, and produce a spontaneously inflammable mixture with rags, shavings and other packing material, is a dry, flocculent, reddish-brown powder, like snuff or cayenne pepper, compressible into flakes between the fingers and moist to the touch. In a loose, non-compressed condition, it does not explode, but burns slowly, with but little smoke and no smell. For blasting rocks it is much superior to gunpowder, much less drilling being necessary, and it is especially adapted for working in closed mines or tunnels, as it leaves no smoke, and does not discolour the rock. It is claimed that there is much less danger in transporting and handling it than is the case with gunpowder. A detonating cap is required to explode it.

Late California papers contain the results of recent experiments in dynamite, in that State, that would seem to justify the claims made in its behalf. A hole, three inches deep and three-quarters of an inch in diameter, was drilled in a 42-pound shot, a fuse inserted to the bottom, resting upon the detonating cap, and the cavity filled with the powder. On igniting the fuse, the shot was blown to atoms. A quarter ounce of the powder was laid on the middle of a piece of plank, six feet long and three inches thick, and another board placed upon it. The explosion shivered the upper board to fragments and split the plank. Some powder laid on the surface of a boulder of sandstone, weighing half a ton, broke it into fragments.

Small holes, drilled in similar boulders, and filled with powder, shattered them to pieces. Charges, exploded in stumps of large trees, tore them into pieces and out of the ground.

The following story is current in Paris: "The principal Ministers of the Sultan give at Constantinople, from time to time, balls a l'Europeene. Not many months ago Fuad Pacha had a dancing party at his sumptuous residence. At those balls our own etiquette is strictly adhered to, with the sole exception that the Turkish ladies remain in their apartments, where they are visited only by the fair sex. A young attache, very fond of practising the precept of Napoleon the Great, "Nothing is impossible in this world," gave his arm to the wife of his chief and led her to the harem. When he had reached the threshold he seemed to be inclined to span it, when Fuad Pacha, who was watching all the while, came and said to him, "Pardon me, sir, you are accredited to the Porte. Your mission ends here."

MR REYNER has recently re-covered the Hammers of the Pianoforte used in my family with the new improved patent leather, and otherwise repaired it.
