

SUMMER

From brightening fields of etherial bloom...

Now, standing by the burning, the potent sun...

Half in a flash of clustering roses lost...

Welcome, ye shades! ye bowery thickets, hail!

As from the face of heaven the shattered clouds...

Joined to the kind, and numerous blast...

"Well, wife, this is too bad. How true the poet says:

"At any rate, I am not sorry we called him home..."

The next evening Mr. Coventry looked in the...

"Have a good hot supper ready, wife; they'll be famished..."

The train roared into the depot, and whizzed...

"Ah, Mrs. Bradley, I'm glad to see you, and your niece, too..."

They were soon in the carriage, and driving homeward...

On his asking them if they had met a young artist named Coventry...

Mr. Coventry watched Ella closely as her aunt was talking...

When they arrived at the house, Mrs. Coventry took them right up to lay off their things...

"Well, father, have they come?"

"Yes; they are up stairs with your mother. Now, be sure and make yourself agreeable to the young lady..."

"But..."

"Tut, tut! 'But me no buts.'" As his mother and her guests came into the library...

Before he had recovered his composure again, his father said:

"Miss Merrill, this is my son Frank. I think you have met before."

Old Mr. Coventry's plans did not go "aglee," and before many months had passed...

"Ella, it was here, crossing this stone, I first saw you."

"My dear, here is a wild-rose spray. Does it remind you of the one you placed in my book?"

Drawing her gently to him, Frank Coventry looked down into the happy face of his young wife...

"Yes, I little thought that spray of rose was my first tribute to her who was to be my 'green rose of the rosebud garden of girls.'"
