DOMINION PARLIAMENT

Friday's Proceedings.

(Condensed from Mail's Summary.)

THE BUDGET.

Mr. Cartwright, in commencing his Budget Speech, said his early forebodings, gloomy as they were, had been more than realized. In three years the volume of trade had been reduced fifty millions of dollars; while the duties had fallen away three millions. To this loss of trade ought to be added at least forty millions, which if there had not been inflation and consequent reaction, would have represented the normal increase of our commerce. The demand for home manufactures had unquestionably fallen away, but he did not believe it was greater than the comparative reduction in imported manufactures. It was satisfactory to find the tide had turned in some degree, for in the past seven months the augmentation of the revenue had been a million of dollars. This increase was in a measure due to the great fire in St. John, but there had been an increase in all the Provinces. Referring to the ordinary expenditures for 1876-7, he went over the various items as given in the Public Accounts. His loans he contended, had been very successful, and in justification of this remark as applicable to his last loan read a statement of all the loans negotiated on the London Stock Exchange last year. This statement further proved that the parties who took up the loan could have made no inordinate profit out of it, and indeed in some cases there must have been loss. The Government were, therefore, justified in negotiating their loan of 1876 in advance of the time originally intended by them. Turning to the ordinary expenditures, while in 1876-7 there had been but a small increase over 1873-3, there had been a decrease over 1875-6 of about a million and a half dollars. That side of the statement the House, he thought, would agree with him, was very satisfactory, though unhappily, owing to the shrinkage of values, there had been a deficit of a million and a half of dollars. This, he believed, was mainly due to the bad harvest of 1876. He next took up the Estimates, remarking that they were based on the supposition that we should have a reasonably good harvest this year. He hoped next year to obtain $23,800,000 of revenue as follows: Customs, $13,750,000; Excise, $5,250,000; Stamps, $250,000; Post Office, $1,200,000; Public Works, $1,900,000; Miscellaneous, $1,500,000. He next proceeded to contrast our position now with what it was five years ago. Our liabilities then were $131,000,000, but it would have required as much more, or some seven loans of twenty millions each, to have carried out the obligations of the late Government, including the thirty millions for the Pacific Railway, and some forty millions to meet debentures falling due. Referring to the per capita taxation, he contended that it was now but 5 79 as against 5 86 in 1872-3, and remarked that if our fiscal policy were based on that of the United States the taxation per head would be very much greater than it is, and that our taxation is comparatively light. He spoke of the large municipal indebtedness incurred in the United States and said that in Canada, while the rural municipalities managed their affairs well, city municipalities were reckless and extravagant, and their power should be rigidly restricted. Mr David Wells, no mean authority, declared that the people of the United States lost annually $400,000,000 through the operation of an unnecessarily high tariff, and though the taxation on our people was higher than he desired to see it, it was not one-half as high as that of the United States per capita. Considering that we had had two recurring deficits, it was important the House should consider if some means were not possible of preventing further deficits taking place. He did not say further economy was not possible, but it would be inexpedient, and increased taxation would be undesirable, and might actually cause a reduction of duties. On the whole, he was prepared to recommend that they delay consideration of any new mode of taxation, particularly as the actual deficit was not so great as it seemed. He read from a speech delivered by Sir John Macdonald, and the resolutions adopted by the Conservative Convention lately held in Toronto, both declaring in favour of a national policy, and attempted to make both the subject of ridicule. The policy of the Government was the very reverse of this, and they were prepared to fight it to the death. If moderately prudent, he believed we would soon see the end of the present depression. He did not pretend to say the Government were faultless, or had committed no errors in the past four years, but claimed on the whole reasonable diligence, care, and prudence had been exercised by them.

After recess, and the transaction of routine business,

Dr. Tupper rose to reply to Mr Cartwright. He commiserated that gentleman on his painful position. He was surprised to find him laying claim to prophetic accuracy, his gloomy forbodings having been by no means fulfilled. In his first Budget speech, he said if the House would give him three millions additional taxation it would suffice for all his necessities. The House gave him the money, but in the session of 1877 he had to announce a deficit of nearly two millions and asked for more taxation. The deficit he stated was do to abnormal circumstances, and would not occur again. But it did occur again, and notwithstanding an additional taxation of five hundred thousand dollars, he now announced a further deficit of nearly a million and a half. At the close of his last year's speech, he declared we were getting near clear water, and expressed the hope that this year he would be able to announce a surplus instead of a deficit. Where were his prophecies now? In 1876, he dwelt upon the evils which would have flowed from the deficits which must have occurred if he had not imposed fresh taxation in 1874. He did not seem to hold the same opinion about deficits now, because he proposed no measure to avert a recurrence of what had occurred for two years in succession. What reason had he to believe that the next fiscal year would be better than the last? No one acquainted with the trade and commerce of the country had the least idea that it would be. All our industries were in distress and were likely to continue so, yet the Finance Minister had not the first particle of relief to offer. Practically, the circumstances considered, the policy of the late Government was protective, but that policy ceased when the present Administration came into power. Depression came in with them, and had remained with us ever since. Referring to the various ways in which protection was given to our industries by the late Government, he thanked the Ministry for having nominated Sir Alexander Galt to the Halifax Commission, and spoke of the results of that Commission as a proof of the wise provisions of the Washington Treaty as to our fisheries, though he did not say the award was as large as we ought to have received. He denied that the additional 2½ per cent added to the tariff by the Government was any protection to our manufacturers, owing to the change in the labour market of the United States, and that many articles entering into our manufactures were taken from the free list and taxed. They had destroyed sugar refining and driven the tea trade to New York and Boston. The Finance Minister had squarely laid down the issue on which the approaching election was
