Tariff Notes.

(National.)

Question for Free Traders.—If the duty is always added to the price, and if the consumer pays the duty, why is it that the foreign manufacturer and the importing merchant are always so solicitous to have the duty removed?

Free Traders point to England's increasing trade has a proof of the advantages of a free trade commercial policy. What are the facts? The total imports and exports of Great Britain are as follows:

Year	1873	£682,292,137
"	1874	667,733,165
"	1875	655,452,900
"	1876	631,931,305

This shows a gradual decrease instead of increase of trade.

When the great railway strikes took place recently in the States, English writers attributed the trouble on the American lines to protection. There was a strike on the Canadian Grand Trunk before the American strikes took place and there has recently been a big labour riot in Quebec. If the trouble in America was due to protection, that here must have been due to Free Trade.

Prior to the repeal of the Corn Laws in England, the Manchester school of political economists were loud in their assertions that poverty in England would gradually decline as soon as they had cheap bread. But facts are stubborn things. For the ten years preceding the repeal of the Corn Laws the gross amount expended in the relief of the poor was £46,766,097. From 1846 to 1855 the amount expended for the same purpose was £53,594,078.

The United States, in the language of Canadian Free Traders, has a protective tariff—a Chinese Wall—around her, and she can neither sell nor buy. How is it, then, if she cannot sell or buy, that England in the year 1855 bought American merchandise to the value of £25,741,762, and in 1876 to the value of £75,899,008? How was this done if the United States cannot sell? In 1855 England sold the American goods valued at £18,062,603, and in 1876 to the value £20,226,627. How was this done if they cannot buy?

In the year 1855, before the existence of the commercial treaty between France and England, England bought from France goods valued at £9,246,418, and sold to France goods valued at 10,421,881, a difference in favour of England of £1,175,463. In the year 1860 France and England made a commercial treaty; France pronounced for protection, England remained free trade. In the year 1876 Protective France bought from England goods valued at £29,000,273, but she sold England the same year goods valued at £45,305,854, or a balance in favour of the protected country of £16,304,581.

British writers and Canadian free traders are very fond of extolling the policy of free trade and of commending it to all commercial and manufacturing countries. Sometimes, however, they overdo it and unconsciously confess in the very paragraph in which they are preaching free trade, that Britain's supremacy is due to protection. Here is a case in point. In the Edinburgh Review for July, 1877, the statement is made that the commercial monopolies of the Elizabethan age "were the ladders by which England climbed to the top of the commercial tree." Not so bad for a free trade Review.

We read in the Arabian Nights of a ship that had been carried by the current so near to a rock of adamant that her bolts being drawn out she fell to pieces. Such precisely must become the position of every country in which industrial developement has still to be accomplished, and yet adopts the doctrine of "laissez faire"—manufactures being the bolts of the country. Turkey, Jamaica, India, Portugal, Mexico, Peru, South of Ireland, Buenos Ayres prove it. Land and labour are almost valueless there. In those countries, the theory of every population finds its most available material, and every one of them is steadily declining in their power to maintain commerce with the world.

Prof. Rouleaux, the head of the German Commission at the Philadelphia Exhibition, has published a statement in which he declares that the excellence and the cheapness of manufactured goods are due to the protective policy. He says: "Let not Germans wonder at this; for we also in former days utilized the system of protection with the greatest success." And he adds statistical evidence to prove that the United States is prospering under protection, notwithstanding the panic, while German industries are suffering because of the partial withdrawal of protection. No stronger tribute to the value of a protective policy has yet appeared than the elaborate statement of this eminent German Protectionist.

The Philadelphia Trade Journal says:—"A favorite axiom of the advocates of free trade is, that a protective tariff increases the cost of domestic manufactures to the consumer. Whatever duty you lay upon any article, so much more will you have to pay for that article than it would bring if left without protection. Such is the assumption. Do the facts bear it out? Not at all. Under judicious tariff regulations, the competition between our own manufacturers will always bring prices as low as they ought to be. For example: Would any free trader desire to see the best American prints sold lower than 6½c. a yard? This is the figure at which they are freely sold to-day—not under the hammer, or the shadow of the hammer, but of deliberate purpose, in the way of competition. Who believes that the tariff, or the foreign prices, have anything whatever to do with fixing those low prices for such goods?
