Lord Dufferin's Trip to Ireland.

(From a correspondent on board the Polynesian.)

We sailed from Quebec on Saturday morning, the 19th of October, by the Polynesian, having Lord Dufferin on board. Before sailing the citadel fired a salute of 19 guns, to which the Sirius—man-of-war—replied with 19 more.

A procession was then formed, the Sirius leading, then the Argus—man-of-war—and lastly the Polynesian. After proceeding a few miles below Quebec in this manner, the men-of-war slowed, and as the Polynesian steamed past the Sirius, that vessel manned yards, the sailors giving three rousing cheers, in acknowledgment of which Lord Dufferin raised his hat, for we passed quite close to the Sirius. When passed and clear of her, she gave us a parting salute of 19 more guns, and so the most popular Governor that ever ruled Canada had left. The men-of-war were to continue on to Halifax to take part in the reception to be given to the new Governor General and the Princess Louise. In due time we left them far behind and out of sight, for they do not pretend to steam as fast as a mail steamship.

During the night the weather became thick so we had to come to an anchor, and did not get to Rimouski until noon next day, or about 14 hours behind the time we should have been there. Rimouski is about 162 miles below Quebec on the south side of the St. Lawrence, and is where we receive the mails, which follow us by train long after we leave Quebec, and are brought out about three miles from the shore in a nice little tender, which was built by the Post Office Department for that purpose. We steamed for Belle Isle, passing the large island of Anticosti on the left or "port side." Belle Isle is a large island situated between the northeast portion of Newfoundland and Labrador. There is a fine light-house on it 470 feet above the ocean level, and its light can be seen in clear weather 28 miles distance. Inside the straits we hailed and stopped the steamship Waldensian, manned a boat, and sent some letters on board her from Lord Dufferin to be taken back to Canada.

Getting under steam again, we were soon out in the heavy roll of the Atlantic, but did not experience any very uncomfortable feelings for a day or two, until the wind increased a little, and the big ship rolled heavily, when those who had a great deal to say, and had come to every meal previously, slipped away silently to their cabins, to be heard and seen no more for the rest of the trip. How meek and lowly-minded even the greatest become under the miserable feeling of sea sickness, and how subdued the chatterbox! Lord Dufferin was a good sailor, turned up at all the meals, and made himself agreeable to all on board, speaking to all alike, and even timid young girls he taught not to be afraid to speak to him.

As a great many people have no idea of the internal economy and size of a big steamship, I may perhaps be excused for giving a few of these particulars here. The length of the Polynesian is 415 feet; breadth, 42 feet; depth, 35 feet; and her tallest mast—the mainmast—is 160 feet high above deck. To manage her at sea over 100 people are required for a crew, which includes the captain, four officers, doctor, seven engineers, four quartermasters, purser, two boatswains, firemen, sailors, boys, lamptrimmer, sailmaker, boilermaker, and two stewardesses. The amount of feeding on a big steamship is something tremendous. There is breakfast at 8:30 for the cabin passengers, lunch at 1, and dinner at 6 o'clock. The steerage passengers breakfast at 7, have dinner at noon, and tea at 5; and the officers, engineers, firemen, sailors, quarter-masters, boatswains, carpenter, and stewards have eight separate messes, in eight separate mess rooms, and this is to keep all the grades and trades from quarrelling. The cost of a ship like the Polynesian is over $600,000 equipped and ready for sea, and her pay list from Liverpool to Quebec and back, about a month, requires a bag of silver and gold coins to the amount of nearly $4,000, to pay off all the crew. She has engines which work up to about 2,800 horse power, and require the heat of 70 tons of coal per day to keep them going. The seven or eight days of the passage are generally spent on board in reading, walking the quarter-deck, flirting, shuffle board, or quoits, which are rope rings instead of iron so that they will not injure the deck or any person's head, and in the evening by music, chess, backgammon, or cards in the saloon weather permitting. All these are dependent on good weather for if there is a sea on and the ship rolling, then good-bye to any of the above recreations in the saloon or on deck, for every one beats a retreat to their cabin to be sea sick, and what a gloomy hole a ships cabin is. The grandeur that you read about of the saloons on Ocean steamships is all a myth, for they are not to be compared to the saloons of our Lake Ontario steamers, in lofty ceilings, comfort or anything else. The ceiling of the saloon of a steamship of any line on the Atlantic clears your head by very little over a foot, so fancy if you can the rotten air that accumulates in such a low place, when the skylights have been fastened down and covered over for ten or more days in a gale as I have often experienced, and eating one's meals in such fœtid air. Every new steamship that is launched in England brings out the fulsome penny-a-liner, who goes into raptures over this last magnificent triumph of marine architecture, and he goes into ecstacies as he describes the five, or more bulkheads and watertight compartments of the ship, which he wants land's people to believe will keep her afloat if one or even two of them were full of water, but don't believe such twaddle. Why did not the watertight compartments of the Ville de Havre, Atlantic, Vicksburg, and the wrecks of about twenty steamships around the British North American coast save them? There is no such thing in any steamship on the Atlantic as separate, detached, unconnected, watertight compartments. There are however strong iron partitions running across every steamship to stiffen her, but they are not watertight compartments. Some of the Allan steamships are fitted up with post offices expressly for the purpose, in which about 21,000 letters and 25,000 newspapers are sorted every week by an officer who is sent in charge by the Canadian Government, and this work keeps him employed fully six days on the trip to or from England. There are six officers employed in this service, and four of them are continually afloat, that is two are going east and two west continually on four ships to keep the weekly service going, for which the Allans receive a handsome sum from the Canadian Government.

Yesterday Lord Dufferin had an interview in London with the Secretary for the Colonies, and then left for France. Rumour has said that the Princess Louise told the Countess of Dufferin that she intended to be as popular in Canada as she (the Countess of Dufferin) had been. Prince Arthur and Leopold are both coming to Liverpool to take leave of their sister on her departure for Canada on the 14th of November, and the Corporation is going to present the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise with an address before they embark on the Sarmatian.
