THE COAST DEFENCES,

Some attention is being given to the proposed fortifications at Esquimalt. The forts are to be constructed and armed by the imperial government, but where is the garrison to come from? Enquiry at the militia department gives no satisfactory information in respect to this question. This department says that it has had no information of the intention of the imperial authorities to send troops from Halifax to the Pacific coast to garrison the forts. "There is an impression," says the Vancouver Herald, "that Canada will have to do this. It is feared that Canada is slowly but surely moving in the direction of a standing army, and this is not a pleasant outlook. It can hardly be expected that the British government will do everything in the way of providing protection for the country. Canada is practically independent and so long as she continues her present relations with the mother country she will have to assume some of the obligations which that independence implies." Most assuredly, and if the imperial federationists have their way Canada will contribute to some of the obligations which federation involves. So far this country has found it quite enough to provide for her own military expenses, and even in regard to them there is niggardly economy. The volunteers are not drilled every year, only sections of them, and those that are drilled are imperfectly equipped. And in the face of these facts the federation dreamers would have Canada assume a share of the war debt of England and of the cost of maintaining England's standing army. Independence cannot mean much, or any, more than imperial federation in this respect, and so the contingencies of relation should not affect our necessary coast defences. If the Canadian government fortifies Esquimalt it had better garrison the same.

MR. M'LELAN SATISFIED.

In the press telegrams of yesterday Mr. McLelan is represented as having left Ottawa well satisfied with the talked-of cabinet positions, and especially with the manner in which these changes affect him. Well, he ought to be satisfied. He has been shown a great deal of consideration. He has never been a succesful administrator of departmental business, and a political opponent will surely be excused for saying this when a political ally has done so. The opinion of the Quebec Chronicle should be accepted as a candid one, seeing that it has been particularly warm in its admiration of the government. Alluding to Mr McLelan it says: "He is an amiable gentleman, but excessively close in all his dealings with men. As a minister of the crown he has failed to impress the public entirely. In many ways he was a failure. But he was too strong to set aside, and he was given a chance in 1882 by Sir John to show what was in him. He began his career in the cabinet as minister of marine and fisheries. He was not a conspicuous success. Later he became minister of finance, but again the office proved too much for him. As postmaster-general he was only tolerable." All of which is quite suggestive, especially of the discontent which has existed so long in ministerial circles and which is only now given expression to. Mr. McLelan is very dignified, very much affected by his own importance, and ought to make an excellent lieutenant-governor. Laterly the gubernatorial offices and some of the seats on the bench have been reserved for the political incapables. Sir John declared that Letellier de St. Just's usefulness expired while he was in office, but in the case of Mr. McLelan his usefulness has departed before he reaches the refuge to which, for expediency's sake, he has been assigned. But then Mr. McLelan is satisfied and that is enough.

THE THIRD PARTY.

A great deal of interest has centered in the proceedings of the prohibition convention which has been held in Montreal. The issues coming before it were many, but the issue that concerned the temperance people most was the suggested formation of a third party. The movement originated in Toronto some months ago, but its birth was marked by a division among the leaders of the Dominion Alliance, by a breach which time has not helped to close. No opportunity to test its popularity occurred like that at Montreal, and in connection with the convention the occasion seemed to arise for final and emphatic action of some kind. The advocates of the third party were present in force and made the debate a memorable one. Their platform was submitted, by Mr. McLaren, Q.C., who said it was not quite, but almost, unanimously recommended by the committee on political action. The report called for (1) united political action on the part of those favouring the total prohibition of the liquor traffic; (2) the endorsation of what has already been done by parliament in this behalf; (3) the taking of steps to nominate and elect an out-and-out prohibitionist in every constituency; (4) the provision for a political committee in connection with the Dominion Alliance to direct the plan of campaign; (5) the election of a committee of twenty-one to act in regard to elections until the alliance is reorganized; and (6) the appointment of a committee to promote and supervise prohibition legislation.

Rev. Dr. Sutherland brought matters to a point by stating that he had no faith in either of the existing parties. If they were going to bring out independent candidates they wanted independent action, and this was practically the formation of a new party. He, therefore, suggested, as a feeler, resolutions in amendment, to the effect that the convention had no faith in either party taking up prohibition; that it recommended independent political action and approved of the formation of a new party, with prohibition as one of its principal planks. Rev. Dr. Griffin also agitated the third party idea, but only wanted one plank. Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald had got into power on one plank. Some of them thought it a rotten one, but he got there on it just the same.

"The convention," says the Montreal Herald, "now went the 'whole hog,' and Mr. Steele, of Toronto, grand councillor of the Knights of Templars of Temperance, moved a sub-amendment, asking for the prompt enforcement of prohibition and the immediate formation of a prohibition party."

Following this the discussion became red hot. Senator Vidal declared that by forming a third party the temperance men would be fighting themselves. Mr. Munn, of Toronto, pitched into both the existing parties. One was depraved, the other was past redemption. The reform party had given the temperance movement some encouragement; the conservative party was a party of saloon-keepers. Rev. Mr. McKay, of Toronto, protested strongly against the third party idea. The moment, he said, a party was formed it would prevent christian ministers from taking up prohibition from the pulpit.

Mr. Spence, secretary of the alliance, pronounced the third party scheme impracticable. Mr. Dougall said the new departure meant two rum parties against one prohibition party. Rev. Mr. Parsons repudiated the third party, and so did Mr. Patterson, who pointed out that though two members of parliament were said to head the third party no one knew who they were. Mr. Jamieson, M.P., fought shy of the third party, and endorsed the idea of Hon. Mr. Foster, that the country was not yet ripe for total prohibition.

Mr. Foster, M.P. for Brome, put the finishing touch to the discussion. He warned the temperance men to do nothing that would isolate from them the seventy members of parliament who now voted in favour of prohibition. He himself was a member of the liberal party, and worked with that party because he believed in so doing he was serving the best interests of his country. At the same time he was a prohibitionist and the moment the liberal party went against prohibition he left it. Therefore those who upheld the new party put him in a strange position. The new party had no doubt a large number of men in the country, but for some time they would have very few in the house. Was he to leave the body which had influence and could do some good and join one that would have little or no influence in the house for years to come? He could not remain in the liberal party and belong at the same time to the new one, or go into the new one and work with the liberal. Considering these facts he asked them not to put those forty-three members into this dilemma. He was not one of those who said that the Scott act was the laughing stock of the country. On the contrary he was going to stick to it and not give up because they had a few reverses. The temperance men had made a great advance in the past, especially in the last session. The great step in advance he alluded to was the Mills resolution, which meant that the liberal party pledged itself to secure amendments to the Scott act. It was said the Mills' bill was a buncombe resolution. He would tell them that Mr. Mills had moved it with the full approval of the liberal party, (applause), and votes had been given in favor of it by liquor men in the liberal party. It is said that because it was tantamount to a vote of want of want of confidence in the government that it was unfair. In answer to this he would say that anything which would make the government place on record its position in the question was fair and right.

After the speech the convention shaped for a vote, and when it was taken the third party was wiped out by a vote of 109 to 60. Its reign was short and weak and barren of result. A few may desire to continue it, but its influence is gone.
