THE HERON.

Where water grass grows ever green
On damp, cool flats by gentle streams,
Still as a ghost and sad of mien,
With eyes half closed, the heron dreams.

Above him in the sycamore
The flicker beats a dull tattoo;
Through papaw groves the soft airs pour
Gold dust of blossoms and fragrance new.

And from the thorn it loves so well
The oriole flings out its strong
Sharp lay wrought in the crucible
Of its flame-circled soul of song.

The heron nods, the charming runes
Of Nature's music thrill his dreams,
The joys of many Mays and Junes
Wash past him like cool summer streams.

What tranquil life, what joyful rest
To be thus swathed in fragrant grass,
And doze like him while tenderest
Dream waves across my sleep would pass.

—Scribner for May.

Bears.—Since Messrs. Perry Davis & Son commenced the manufacture of Bearine, the Canada trapper has found a lucrative business in capturing old Bruin. Messrs. Davis & Son pay a good price for the grease, and the skins are always sought after. Messrs Davis & Son have a mode of refining the grease, perfuming it, &c., making it superior to any others we have ever seen.

Wedding in Constantinople.

To read of a Turkish wedding hardly impresses one with the idea that the civilization of Mahometans is up to the Christian standard. For the bride groom it is not so bad, but for the bride it must be rather wearying and a good night's rest a comforting luxury. A lady correspondent who witnessed the ceremony—and lady correspondents are always so precise—describes a recent experience in Constantinople:

A young lady, where we were invited, was to marry a poor clerk, who had a salary of about seven dollars a week. The bride, however, was quite well off, having two houses and some twenty thousand Turkish piras, ($100,000) as a marriage portion. This was all given over to the bridegroom previous to the nuptials.

The bride was dressed very prettily, and was covered with a most curious veil made of long slips of gold tinsel, which reached to her feet. Through this you could not see, except the bottom of her dress. The Armenian women are generally very pretty, but perfect fools in their manners and expressions; so much so that when one man wishes to offend another he says "Pretty Armenian!" which really means a fool. She was dressed in white silk brocaded with silver and pearls and around her was a wide belt containing a fortune in precious stones. Her cheeks were painted a deep crimson, laid on in a heart shape, and another heart put artistically put on the chin, while the rest of the face was as white as the luminous cosmetic could make it. The eyebrows met and also stretched to the hair on each side of the temples, and were as black as they could be painted. The inside of her fingers' ends and finger nails were also stained crimson. Her hair, which was long and thick, though was braided full of little jingling coins. The outlines of her form were, as usual, totally hidden by the clumsily made clothes. Her feet were encased in velvet slippers, embroidered with pearls. Large solitaire diamonds constituted her ear-rings.

We sat down, and coffee was brought to us in little cups about the size of an egg-shell, carried in a tiny golden filagree holder. Turkish coffee is the sublime essence of the spirit of coffee, and deserves to be immortalized. We only get an adulterated apology for it in America. Sweetmeats were handed around which tasted like paregoric, or something flavored with anice seed or mastic. The supper room was furnished singly and elegantly, only one table and one chair, but divans in profusion. It seemed cold and cheerless, and there were no appliances for a fire.

We went then to the parlor to await the arrival of the bridegroom and the priests, four of whom were to perform the ceremony. The bride was seated upon a sort of chair, without a back, and her veil arranged so as to completely hide her. The rooms in all the houses here are furnished very simply, with divans all around the walls; in the centre of this room was a fountain very handsomely carved. The floor was covered with elegant Persian carpet, and the ceiling fairly festooned with lamps. We furnish our houses too much generally, and they, none of them, look so really elegant as do these houses here.

The bridegroom and his friends arrived at about 9 o'clock, and other friends and acquaintances began to arrive, but the priests did not come. We waited and waited. 10 o'clock and still no priests. The father of the bride went to see what was the reason of the delay, and soon returned to say that they were at another wedding, but would surely be here soon. So we had coffee and more sweetmeats; the gentlemen drank mastic to sharpen their appetites, and smoked cigarettes to enliven the monotony.

At 1 o'clock no priests had arrived. Finally a boy came to say they would be along directly. The people did not seem to mind the delay, but the poor bride must, as she sat erect on her chair, speaking to no one nor moving.

Nearly two o'clock it was when the priest came, preceded by a crowd of boys bearing censors and making a horrid noise which was called singing. The priests were decorated with gold embroidery from head to foot, and the chief priest wore a sort of mitre on his head literally blazing with jewels. The carpet was now covered with one far more elegant, having tassels of pearls at each corner. The chief priest took his place on the centre of this and the other three behind. The father of the bride took her by the hand and led her forward to the bridegroom, and the two then stepped before the priest. Two boys brought cushions with a green wreath on each for the bride and bridegroom. The bride's was kept in place by the tinsel veil, but that of the unfortunate Haskar kept sliding backward or forward all the time, making him very uncomfortable. The bride was under rather than over ordinary height for women, and the bridegroom a very tall man, and they were obliged to stand with their foreheads touching each other during the whole of the ceremony, which lasted certainly an hour. It seemed to consist mostly of swinging of the censors and singing by the boys, and a sort monotonous chant by the three priests. At last it was finished by Haskar handing a plain gold ring to his bride and receiving one from her in exchange, and then they both kneeled for a few moments while the priests chanted and the boys swung the censors around very close to the heads of the unfortunate couple. They then rose, and the priests departed, after having regaled themselves in the supper room alone.

The party then adjourned to the supper room, the bride was lifted by the men and seated astride a small barrel of wine and the feast commenced. She had to sit there till all the wine was drank out of that barrel, which was nearly two hours. She looked tired enough before all was over, for she got nothing to eat at all. The Arminians are good eaters, and it was daylight before the feast concluded, and the guests departed.

Don't Know What to Do.—We sometimes hear persons say, "my horse is sadly out of condition, and I cannot tell either what is the matter with him, or how to get him into better order." They appear to be ignorant of the fact there is within their reach a remedy safe, sure and effectual in all cases. Many persons who deal in horses use large quantities of it, and testify that its effects are more satisfactory. One horse dealer informs us that his horse's condition and appearance are so much improved by its use that they sell more readily and for higher prices. The articles "Durley's Condition Powders and Arabian Heave Remedy." Nothing else is equal to it for the same purpose. Remember the name and see that the signature of Hurd & Co. is on each package.
