Progress.

It is very important in this age of vast material progress that a remedy be pleasing to the taste and to the eye, easily taken, acceptable to the stomach and healthy in its nature and effects. Possessing these qualities, Syrup of Figs is the one perfect laxative and most gentle diuretic known. W. J. Wilson, the Pharmacy, Agent.

Results of a Scratch.

Mrs. Ramsaler Cooper, Bloomfield, suffered from a bad finger, caused by a simple scratch becoming inflamed, and threatening most serious results. The doctors decided to amputate the finger and part of the hand, and this was done by Drs. Bowerman and Kidd, on Sunday.

BROADBRIM'S LETTER.

THE METROPOLIS HAS BEEN GOING TO THE DOGS.

This is the Writer's Funny Way of Saying a Kennel Show Was on—The Fields and Their Sorrows—Some Old-Time Criminals Coming Back.

(Special Correspondence.)

NEW YORK, March 4.—For the entire week the whole town has been going to the dogs (at the Madison Square garden.). The horse show and the dog show are the fashionable fads of the time. It not only takes in the very best society people, but it also enlists the sympathies of the race course touts, gamblers and prigs, and here, every day and every evening, can be seen all classes from a bed-carrier to a millionaire. Lissey woolsey and satinette rub against Lyons silks and three piled velvet, and the gamin of the Bowery, ragged and unkempt, marches down the aisle alongside of beautiful Mademoiselle B., the flashing diamonds in whose ears are worth a prince's ransom. There are no shows like the horse and the dog shows; they are aristocratic, they are democratic; they are cosmopolitan, they are exclusive.

But, whatever the quality of the visitors, the dogs and horses are aristocrats to the core. No taint of blood or bar sinister mars the escutcheon of that royal line. No current coursing the veins of any emperor, prince or potentate was ever so pure as the rich blue blood that gives life and beauty and vigor to these canine kings and queens. The proud mother sits in the midst of her little brood, every one of which can claim royal descent. There can be no doubt about their unstained family honor, for the pedigree of the house has been carefully kept for generations. It is possible, in this space, to give even a brief synopsis of the finest bench show that New York has ever seen. The entries exceeded those of any former year, and the receipts are many thousands ahead of any previous exhibition.

To an ordinary observer it seemed as if a specimen of every dog that ever did exist, or could exist might be found in the Madison square garden this week. There were giant Mount St. Bernard's, majestic Danes, Siberian bloodhounds, wolf hounds and stag hounds, collies and Newfoundland.

One majestic young giant, Black Prince, was the cynosure of all eyes, said to be the grandest dog upon the earth. The lice of setters and pointers was noteworthy, as among them were animals with almost human intelligence.

Nor were those dainty little pugs wanting which are such a comfort and delight to the female heart. You don't like to see that hand-some lady hug that snarling little brute to her breast and stoop down to kiss its little puggy nose. I admit, my friend, that it is not a bit pretty. It does look as if she might find something to hug and kiss better than a dog, if she tried, but reflect, the joy of maternity has been denied her and her heart yearns for the affection of something; better a dog than nothing.

Coming out of the show, the other night, an Irishman behind me met a friend at the door and shouted, "Is that you, Malloy?" "It is; how are you, O'Brien? Wor you in to see the dogs?" "I was not." Well, you ought to go; it's a wonderful show, and the greatest attraction among the dogs is the cats." And he was right. Every day Prof. Hampton gave an exhibition of his trained dogs and cats. The dogs were clever and exhibited a high order of intelligence; but it was the cats that absorbed the interest of the show. The professor had trained a couple of cats, which he called Sullivan and Kilrain, to box. Ounce gloves were fitted on their forepaws, and advancing towards each other on their hind legs they went at it hammer and tongs, in true boxing style, till one of them was knocked out, and then the audience screamed with delight. Yes, deny it as we may, we are all gone on the boxing question. When the cat contest was announced there was a general rush from all parts of the house. Grave judges left their awards, fine ladies forsook their darling pets, even beautiful little Kisha, the Mikado's favorite pug, was forsaken, and behind me stood an eminent Presbyterian divine, who fairly howled with delight. The show has been eminently satisfactory and is a great success.

Edward M. Field, the son of Cyrus Field, indicted for forgery, has been on trial all the latter portion of the week, and the result has been a revelation both startling and painful to the public. There seems to have been a taint of insanity through the principal portion of the family. The father of David Dudley, Cyrus and Stephen J. Field was demented years before his death, and then comes a long list of uncles and aunts, cousins and other relations who had been confined for years in lunatic asylums.

It was a pitiful scene on Thursday when the wife of Edward M. Field took the stand to testify to her husband's insanity. The grief of the past few months had done its work, and the woman had prematurely aged. The deep furrows on her face told of agony and suffering indescribable. It was a terrible ordeal. As she advanced to the witness chair she passed close to her husband; his face was buried in his hands and there was no sign of recognition. When she began to speak it was in a low tone, and heads were craned forward to catch the sound of her voice but its echo brought back no memory of the old One love, now shattered in helpless ruin, to him who sat there dead to his surroundings, a hopeless, helpless maniac. As the wretched wife told the story of her married life many eyes were wet. Life opened to her so gloriously, young, rich, courted on every side, her father-in-law one of the great men of his age and the possessor of unlimited wealth; her husband promising to become one of the nation's great financiers, a magnificent home, horses, carriages, servants, rich jewels, and her husband's undoubted love. What could the earth give more? Riches, health, honor, love, all were hers.

By how frail a tenure we hold these fleeting and substantial blessings. All had vanished. The lovely young bride, crowned with orange blossoms, sat there in weeds of woe and told the closing story of a life bitterer than Marah's waters. The love that once was hers was gone, harsh words and unkind deeds emphasized the madness which struck him down and left his mind in ruins. When the poor, tearful wife had told her story there was hardly a man in the court but felt like rendering the old English verdict: "Done by the dispensation of God." The proofs are so overwhelming of the existence of hereditary insanity in the Field family that there is hardly a doubt of his committal to a lunatic asylum instead of a prison.

On the Etruria, this week, we had a distinguished arrival in the person of Austin Byron Bidwell who, in company with his brother, George Bidwell Edward Noyes and George McDonald, in 1872, swindled the Bank of England out of two hundred thousand pounds. There have been plenty of forgeries and attempts at forgeries, but for desperate daring, the magnitude of the plunder and success of the undertaking, it has scarcely been equalled in the annals of time. When the forgery was discovered all England was aflame, and Scotland Yard nearly suffered a collapse in its efforts to trace the criminals. Yet so completely had they covered their tracks that the clue seemed entirely lost. Meanwhile one of the swindlers had purchased an estate in Devonshire and set up for a country gentleman. He invited the neighboring squires to his dinners, bought a red coat and followed the fox hounds and was greatly admired by all the surrounding gentry for his lavish hospitality. At last Scotland Yard got on the scent, and the robbers scattered and fled. Noyes and one of the Bidwells sought safety on the continent, George McDonald and the other Bidwell fled to America. They were arrested on the steamer after stoutly denying their identity, and were safely lodged in Ludlow street jail, while awaiting the extradition papers. But they resolved not to go back without a struggle. The best legal talent in New York was engaged, and after a fight of many months they were delivered up to the Scotland Yard detectives and carried back to England where, after trial, the whole four were sentenced to imprisonment for life. George Bidwell, who was supposed to be paralyzed, secured a pardon, and was brought home to die, but he seems to have been as clever at counterfeiting death as counterfeiting money, for the two notorious rascals gave a stereopticon entertainment at Chickering hall, on Thursday night, showing the ins and outs of prison life, expecting to reap a reward from their infamous record. But the thing fell flat; the public who knew them as swindlers refused to be caught. But it was a bold attempt, and worthy of the Bidwells, to try and make money by an infamous reputation.

Columbia college, one of the oldest and most respected educational institutions in New York, is now seeking to become a university, to support which with becoming dignity will demand an endowment of several millions. Of course a university would be away ahead of an ordinary college. Harvard, Yale and Princeton would have to haul down their colors. If Columbia succeeds as well as a university as she does as a college it would seem to be a first-class place to send our sons to if we expected to make them graduates for the prize ring or states prison.

On Thursday night the freshmen had a dinner at Morrelli's. The blackguards of the sophomore class got a lot of forged tickets printed, and on them tried to get into Morrelli's and get possession of the tables before the freshmen arrived! In this they were defeated, for the freshmen had torn their tickets in half, and it was not till the two halves were matched that the holder was admitted. Failing in this the sophomores attacked the freshmen in most brutal fashion, and many were wounded on both sides before the freshmen reached their dinner room. Then it was discovered that their toast-master had been seized and locked up in a room by these brutal ruffians. I don't know why, but our regular citizens would be sent to the penitentiary for one half the offence of these college ruffians. I have not heard that the worthy president, Seth Low, or any of the faculty, have interfered with this scandalous programme. By all means let us have a university, but when it is finished and plentifully endowed, and its graduates are let loose on the streets, it will be safe for every citizen to provide himself with a bowie knife and revolver, and it might also be well to keep his females in the house and his valuables in the safe deposits.

From the Criminal mission, on the corner of Hoyt and Livingston streets in Brooklyn, a funeral took place this week that will be long remembered. Michael Dunn was no ordinary man. More than one-half of his life had been passed behind prison-bars; his back was scarred with stripes where the cat-o'-nine tails had cut away the flesh, and his face showed marks of desperate encounters with ruffians as wicked as himself. He started life on the streets in the wickedest part of London, and before he had reached the age of twenty he was considered one of the most hardened and daring criminals in England. He was transported to Van Dieman's Land, but he soon escaped to the bush, and with a band of desperadoes as wicked as himself became the terror of the surrounding country. It would require a volume to tell the story of his life, stained with murder, robbery and almost every crime in the calendar. He passed thirty-three years of his life in prison, and at last, like Jerry McAuley, in New York, when the night seemed darkest and while yet a prisoner he heard, through his prison bars, a still, small voice that promised him, sin-scarred and wicked as he was, hope and pardon. He fell upon his knees in prayer and rose a man regenerated and redeemed. When he was released he went forth to preach of his Saviour's love and promises. He founded homes where criminals cast adrift could find shelter and employment, and worked faithfully for Christ Jesus till last week when his Master called him home.—BROADBRIM.

MAY TAKE A SCHOOL.

It Would be a Good Thing to Have the Change.

It is said that there is a prospect of the collegiate institute being turned over to the public school board, that negotiations are under way with this end in view. This would mean the building of a new institute, an institution sadly needed. Twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars from the city would do the work for both boards. The public school board could take the institute building and by an expenditure of $2,500 or $3,000 could remodel it to suit present purposes. Then money could be provided for the building of the new institute.

It is said that a school committee has made a careful report on the need of accommodation and it is found that the chief need is in the western end of the city. A school in the neighborhood of the drill shed, containing eight rooms, would suit all present requirements. This being so the collegiate institute building would be quite central enough.

Alfred R. Martin, chairman of the public school board, said that no negotiations had yet taken place. The school property committee would look through the building and ascertain its condition. "Much," he said, "will depend upon their report as to the possibilities of utilizing it for our requirements. I am not prepared to say what attitude the board will take but I can say that I think it is prepared to do almost anything to advance the interest of the city and the boards."

Alex. Horn said it had been suggested and he would very much like to see the two boards meet and consider the position of affairs. There was need for a new institute building and for a new school. It struck him that some arrangement might be made by which the council could satisfy both sides. "Of course the matter has not yet reached the public school board, and I can say nothing as to any prospects for such a thing as you suggest."

Mr. Galloway said: "The ground I take as a citizen is that in the matter of school accommodation a new collegiate institute is as necessary as a public school, and to prove this very much might be said. I want to say here that neither as a public school trustee or as a citizen have I opposed the building of a new collegiate institute, but when my opinion is asked, (and I speak now as a citizen) as to the advisability of converting the present institute building into a public school I say, as a matter of economy, I never favor the patching up of old buildings being convinced that it costs more in the end. Then apart from the situation which, while it is very desirable, is not in the best possible location for our needs, it will not give us the necessary accommodation. The least number of rooms that we can do with for present very pressing demands is eight whereas the present collegiate building only contains six."

E. H. Smythe said that certain authorities had given out that the close proximity of a public school to a collegiate institute is not desirable. When this is the case there is a danger of the two systems of school education being merged. This is not good and in order to escape this the systems are kept apart. As far as the speaker was concerned he did not think there would be any serious objection to the old collegiate institute building being used for public school purposes provided it was empty. A new institute would relieve the public schools to a certain extent, and would be in the furtherance of the public school system. The collegiate board has derived much benefit from having present at its meetings a trustee from the public school board. Mr. Horn has been a most active member, and realizes the complete identity of the two boards. The public school board should be the strongest abettor of the collegiate board in the erection of a new institute.

Elsewhere in this issue we publish the particulars of a remarkable cure that fairly out-rivals the celebrated case of John Marshall, of Hamilton, which created such a sensation throughout the country. The particulars of this case are vouched for by the Albany Evening Journal, recognized as the leading newspaper at the New York state capital, and one of the leading papers of the United States. There is, therefore, no room to doubt that the particulars of the case are accurately and carefully set forth, in every respect true, and must therefore prove of the deepest interest to our readers, we therefore commend the article to their careful perusal.

It Died of Grief.

The large Newfoundland dog locked in one of the cells in the police station, yesterday, because it had badly bitten a boy, died of grief. The animal, because deprived of its liberty, moaned all day, and in the afternoon became so weak it could not stand up. Had the dog lived it would have been shot.

The mayor refused to order the dog to be shot, until evidence had been taken against it. Yesterday afternoon the boy, whom the dog had bitten, came to the chief's office and while giving evidence before the mayor against the animal it died in the cells.

On Thursday afternoon, after the dog had bitten the boy his mother called at the police station and requested the dog be shot. The animal was in the vicinity of West street when Officer Aiken came to it. The dog refused to follow him and growled. Officer Timmerman tried to coax the dog to the station and failed. Then Officer Burnett and McCullough went after the animal with a long rope and lassoed it. After a great deal of trouble the dog was corralled.
