A WARM SPEECH.

Mr. Bain, the representative of Wentworth in the house of commons, hit the government hard when, discussing the redistribution bill he said:

"Our hon. friends opposite are never tired of talking about the glorious old flag and British fairplay and justice and equity, but I have observed that they have never, in my political experience, appealed directly to the country on their trade issues and on their policy without beforehand, by some process or other, having endeavored to take some advantage of their political opponents and having handicapped them by some of the various processes with which they are so familiar; and having thus taken an unfair advantage, they then invite their political opponents to take the field. I believe in British fair-play. I believe in a fair field and a clear contest, and let the men who can present the best arguments, let those who can appeal most fairly to the electorate, secure the confidence of the people, but a scheme which handicaps your opponents, a scheme which, while you fill your mouth with appeals about the old flag and British fair-play, is one of the meanest and smallest and most contemptible to be found in the American system of taking advantage of political opponents, is not British, and I hope it never will be Canadian fair-play."

And what was the response? The practical adoption of the cloture. The government has ceased to discuss the measure, and to defend its outrageous proposals. The assault of Mr. Mills upon it, on Tuesday, was really remarkable, and enough to provoke reply if the ministerialists were not wooden men. He distinctly warned the government that brute force might not have its way. "I do not know," he continued, "if this measure is adopted what may be the consequence of it, but I ask the honorable gentleman opposite to seriously consider it. In my opinion it is absolutely impossible to maintain this union if this policy of one of the great parties in the state making war on the other great party is to be sanctioned." With increasing indignation and significant language the honorable gentleman went on: "While you may begin the contest by an intellectual fight in parliament it is very likely to grow to something far more serious than what the honorable gentlemen suppose in their attempt to establish by unfair means the permanent supremacy of one party in this country over the other." Did that paragon of dignity, Sir John Thompson, reply? No. Did any one else rise and speak? No. The usual notes, "That will do," had been given by the premier's factotum and the division was forced. Our own Mr. Metcalfe voted yea on the second reading of the bill, which means "to tie hand and foot", not only the minority in this house and prevent a free expression of public opinion. It means to wipe out Mr. Bain, whose words have been quoted, though one of the oldest members in the house and simply because he is a grit. Mr. Calvin was not in his place, but in committee of the whole the bill will soon have to be considered and he will have abundant opportunity to give his opinion as to the eternal fitness of things.

THE CALL TO BLAKE.

The invitation to Mr. Blake to contest a seat in Ireland, in the interests of home rule, finds favor with all parties in Canada. It came, too, as a surprise. Mr. Blake was not in active political life. He was not in quest of political honors. He had, in his usual course, placed himself on record as a champion of the constitutional rights of the people, as an advocate for Ireland of legislative privileges such as Canadians enjoy, and in the crisis now on in Britain the cry is, "Come over and help us."

The compliment is one which all Canada appreciates, and it is remarkable with what unanimity the hope is expressed that he will accept the proferred honor. There are constituencies in Ireland for which it is only necessary to nominate him in order to secure his election. And once a member of the imperial parliament his advancement would be rapid. Of all the men who have come to America to plead the cause of home rule there is none his intellectual superior, none more eloquent, none more qualified to assume the responsibilities of state. In the house of commons at Westminster he would be a grand representative for Canada as well, and being familiar with its political life and aspirations could speak of its affairs and in its behalf with the feeling of authority.

Better still the day might not be far distant when Mr. Blake would be given scope for the display of his extraordinary power as an executive officer and minister of the crown. As Mr. Mackenzie's colleague in Canada's last liberal regime his was a administration of signal purity, and he left his department as he took it wearing the white flower of a blameless life. As a counsellor of the nation in a wider sphere he would be equal to any emergency and reflect credit upon the land which gave him birth and education and opportunity for the development of his splendid talents.

The press and politicians which differed with Hon. Mr. Blake made light of the speech which he made some years ago and in the course of which he touched upon the importance of Canada having representation in the British parliament. He spoke in advance of his times, and seemingly to no purpose. There is no opening, as he hoped, for a discussion of colonial affairs in Westminster by colonial members, but the same object would be served by men like Mr. Blake being called to the double task of interesting themselves in colonial and imperial affairs. A great deal depends upon the first call to Mr. Blake. Will he accept? That he is at least considering the question and corresponding about it is indeed encouraging.

He is the first Canadian who has been selected for distinction in this way, and it is suggestive of two thoughts: (1) That Canada did not appreciate him sufficiently when he was in political life and willing to serve his country as few are able to do. One conservative paper has it that he went into private life because he could not endure the annexation talk of his party, and his Durham letter is referred to for proof in this point. But the document in question is singularly lacking in evidence in support of that contention. True he expressed a fear that the adoption of commercial union would lead to political union, but he also said that our present protective policy was gradually taking the country in the same direction. And so the Durham letter gives no explanation of the feeling of the man. If he were disgusted over anything it was the perversity of the people, their abandonment of principle, their approval of practices and tactics as dishonorable as they were dangerous. (2) That the people at home are not keen to distinguish merit and give it reward. In the Canadian house of Commons Mr. Blake was not esteemed capable of writing a resolution on the home rule question, and Sir John Costigan was commissioned by an unfriendly government to emasculate it to his liking, still the home rule party calls him to their aid, and in a manner which has no doubt of their sincerity and regard. We hope Mr. Blake may respond to the call favorably, and if he does the Empire may have occasion to regret its sneers. It is the only paper in Canada which has the bad taste to insult the man it does not know enough to honor.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The liberals are determined to resist the gerrymander to the last. To this end the house may as well be fitted up for an all-year session.

* * *

It is declared in print that Dr. Douglass is not responsible for the opinions he expressed in regard to Sir John Thompson. Well, if he is not responsible who is?

* * *

Mr. Balfour gave the Irish party all it demanded in state aid to the Irish schools. But they will vote him into obscurity if they can just the same. They understand his generosity.

* * *

Just think of it. The government, after three weeks' notice, had not time to think of ordering a wreath for Sir John Macdonald's grave on decoration day. Sir John Abbott and Sir John Thompson ought to be ashamed of themselves. Sir Oliver Mowat did not forget his old friend, Sir Alexander Campbell.

* * *

The Hamilton Spectator is right in calling the dominion government down for its useless discussion of Mowat's legislation. "The dominion redistribution act," it remarks, "is good or bad. If conservatives cannot defend it on its merits they had better change it so that it can be defended." Well spoken.

CAN EFFECT A GREAT CHANGE.

You Are Responsible For Your Condition.

Do not complain and grumble about your condition of health. No one is to blame for your weakness, nervousness, sleeplessness and dyspepsia but yourself. These troubles were induced owing to your own neglect and disregard of nature's laws.

You may, if you have decision, be like your friends and neighbors—strong, vigorous and healthy. You may enjoy life and become a blessing to every one around you. You are now in such a state that you require something that will reach to the very root of your difficulties, and eradicate every trace of disease.

The only reliable remedy for this great work is Paine's Celery Compound. It is all sufficient for the most stubborn of maladies, and will never fail in giving relief and bringing a perfect cure.

Knowing this fact it is folly and madness to delay the good work. Every hour lost increases your sufferings and agonies. Be wise; follow the example of others around you who have found a new life through the virtues of earth's grandest medicine. Begin to-day with Paine's Celery Compound and test the powers of one bottle.

Clear Gain.

The money you save by buying your spring and summer dry-goods at our clearing sale. We offer ladies' fast black hose, two pair for 25c, worth 40c; boys' heavy ribbed black hose, perfectly stainless, double knees and heels. See them. Children's hose in three qualities, warranted fast black and very cheap. Any parasol we have in stock at cost price. We are bound not to carry any over to next year. Prints, sateens, challies, all reduced, a 50c challie for 20c less than half price. We will give the biggest bargains ever seen anywhere in dress goods, and we have good value even at the old prices. Remember you can buy dry-goods at less than bankrupt prices at R. McFaul's clearing sale.

A Picton Wedding.

A social event occurred at the residence of G. D. Platt, P.S.I., on Tuesday, the marriage of his popular daughter Lillian to Rev. Mr. Davy, Chester, Pa. Dr. Hamilton, Montreal, and Albert Davy, Whitby, acted as groomsmen, and Miss Edith Anning and Miss Louella Wilson, Picton, as bridesmaids. The ceremony was followed by a sumptuous dinner. Then a reception was given, affording many friends time to offer congratulations. The bride, a general favorite, was the recipient of numerous presents from church societies and the choir, of which she was for years the organist. Mr. Davy is pastor of one of the leading Methodist churches in Chester, Pa.

A Visitor to the City.

George Buskin, of the Algoma and northwest evangelical and colportage mission, is making his ninth annual visit to Kingston in the interests of the work. During the past year 1,760 scriptures and scriptural books were supplied in the district, in eleven languages, by the operations of the mission, fifty religious services conducted and large quantities of religious tracts and magazines distributed in lumber shanties, mills, mines, on public works, also in back districts and among Indians. The sum of $20 25 was contributed in Kingston, last year, for the work.

The Homeliest Man in Kingston.

As well as the handsomest, and others are invited to call on any druggist and get free a trial bottle of Kemp's Balsam for the Throat and Lungs, a remedy that is selling entirely upon its merits and is guaranteed to relieve and cure all Chronic and Acute Coughs, Asthma, Bronchitis, and Consumption. Large bottles 50c and $1.

Married in New York.

Francis E. Donaldson, Brooklyn, and Miss Rose Barker, Bloomfield, were united in marriage on June 8th. The bride was beautifully attired in pearl silk, while the bridesmaid, Miss Lotta Nexon, Toronto, was gowned in light silk bengaline. The groom was supported by John Perry, of Brooklyn. Mrs. Donaldson received many handsome presents.

Oh, What a Cough.

Will you heed the warning. The signal perhaps of the sure approach of that most terrible disease Consumption. Ask yourselves if you can afford for the sake of saving 50c., to run the risk and do nothing for it. We know from experience that Shiloh's Cure will cure your cough. It never fail.

BROADBRIM'S LETTER.

THE HIGHEST FORM OF DETECTIVE NEW YORK HAS.

Complaining of a Lack of Police Assistance—The War the Parting of a Couple Concerned—No Great Act That Will Leave an Impress on Public Service.

(Special Correspondence.)

NEW YORK, June 16.—The New York detective is a very important factor in the administration of justice; but whether he is an angel of light or a devil incarnate is rather a hard matter to determine. His business is unsavoury at best, and yet, as our forces are organized, he seems to be a terrible necessity. Detectives are not all of one class, the lowest being the cloath-hound, who hangs on the trail of a suspected criminal or follows an erring wife, perhaps worms himself into his or her good graces, and when all is ready appears on the stand and denounces his former friend and confidant.

The highest form of detective is he, who after a great bank robbery or forgery, or murder, or other crime of like character, gets a faint clue here, and an obscure hint there, and who works on the tangled skein for months and months, till eventually the skein is unravelled and the criminals are brought to justice. Some of the most marvellous work has been done by the United States detective force, whose special mission is guarding the currency of the republic. The work performed by this branch of our public service can scarcely be estimated, when it is remembered that in an issue of thousands of millions of currency and bonds, the loss to the government has been so infinitesimally small that it hardly figures in any of the government reports. The business of the detective, in this and kindred branches, requires undaunted courage and unquestioned integrity, and while there have been instances of official faithlessness, the general standard of character has been high, the best assurance of which is that there is not a successful counterfeiter at liberty to-day in the United States whose daily life and action is not under the surveillance of the United States detective department.

The work of the Pinkerton detective agency needs no endorsement. The high character it has maintained for thirty years with the principal banks, business houses and corporations has easily placed them among the foremost detectives of the world. Their breaking up of the terrible Molly Maguire conspiracy in Pennsylvania some years ago has never been surpassed by the best detectives of Europe. No branch of our criminal service is exposed to greater temptation, and just now we find it difficult to decide whether the detective is a saint or the other thing.

For some years past there has been a sharp conflict between our police authorities and the various organizations here for the suppression of crime. Anthony Comstock, whose mission it has been to suppress indecent literature and break up gambling houses, has complained most bitterly that he received little or no assistance from the police, and that at times, after devoting weeks and months to collecting evidence against some gaming house with a police pull, after the warrant had been issued and everything seemed ripe for capture, by some mysterious means the criminals got the tip before Comstock and his officers arrived, when it was discovered that all evidence of their crime had vanished and they might just as well have raided a church.

The society founded by the late Dr. Howard Crosby for the suppression of crime, and Elbridge Gerry's society for the prevention of cruelty to children have been continuous in their complaints of the lack of police assistance. It was this that started Dr. Parkhurst on his crusade—a crusade that has resulted in a sort of moral cyclone combined with an earthquake. The police are anxious to escape the odium of imputed villainy, and every effort is being made to discredit the evidence of the two societies named. Last week two detectives of Mr. Gerry's society were arrested by the police for attempting to blackmail an old woman who kept a house of infamous resort where many young girls were ruined. These two officers, Finn and Becker, have been in the society's employ for years, and on their complaint the woman was indicted. She claimed that the officers offered to settle it for her for five hundred dollars. She went at once to the police and told them the story, and by the advice of the officer in charge some of the bills were marked. A policeman and a detective were detailed to follow the woman and see her meet the men. After the meeting, and when she had paid the money, she was to drop her handkerchief and then the policeman and detective were to rush out and make the arrest. The whole thing worked to a charm. Both of the society's detectives were arrested, ironed and taken to headquarters. No money was found upon them, but a policeman found a roll of bills in the street, which the old woman had shown to the officer at headquarters. There was nothing, however, to connect it with the society's detectives. The whole affair has a very fishy smell. It looks very much like a put up job, and rather a poorly put up job at that.

A very funny piece of detective business has resulted in parting man and wife—separating two people who for years past have been the envy of Bohemia, billing and cooing just like turtle doves. No couple in New York was better known in the Broadway and Fifth avenue cafes than Baron Blanc and his wife. Now Blanc wasn't exactly a baron, but he appeared to have lots of money and lived on the best. He kept his coupe, and with Madam Blanc was a familiar figure on the drives of Central park. While Blanc himself was not a bad looking fellow, there was such style about madam that it was no common thing to hear the remark, "By Julius Cæsar she's a stunner!" The couple seemed to be perfectly devoted to each other. At home, at the cafe or the theatre, wherever you saw Monsieur you were pretty sure to see madam. For the past few months, however, madam was without her usual escort a considerable portion of the time; but when at home madam Blanc discovered that whenever she went out she was not unattended, and that from the time she left her house till she returned to it there was always one man and there were frequently two upon her trail. At last Madam Blanc smelt a large sized mouse, and she had the two shadowers arrested, and they confessed in court that they were hired by the baron to keep an eye upon his wife.

Then Madam Blanc went for the baron, and she made it so lively for him that he sought another hotel. Then the baron sold her horses and coupe. Next day madam attached the baron's business for forty thousand dollars loaned. Then the baron swore that she was not worth thirty thousand cents, and that all the money she had he gave her. Then she declared that she had kept him ever since their marriage, and now she is suing for divorce. The accounts are very conflicting; somebody must have told a whopper, but whether it is the baron or whether it is the baroness, I find it difficult to decide, but one thing is certain, they cannot both speak the truth.

The excitement all the week concerning the result at Minneapolis, has been like a seething cauldron. There has not been much loud shouting, but an immense deal of lively hustling by the friends of the rival candidates. There was a marked difference in the tactics of the rival factions. The friends of the plumed knight were as effervescent as champagne, and they exploded like dynamite on the slightest tap. The mere mention of the secretary's name, acted upon them like the shock of an electric battery and they made the welkin ring with the name of Blaine's great and favorite son. There was a loyalty born of years of love and imperial service, which no disaster could shake, and no adversity destroy. It was a loyalty and love entirely independent of political success; it was personal to the man himself, the same in victory or defeat, in life or death. It was the same kind of political idolatry that made Daniel O'Connell, "The man of the people," which made Andrew Jackson the demi-god of democracy, and Henry Clay and Daniel Webster the idols of the whigs. In later days we have seen something of this personal worship for Abraham Lincoln and General Grant; but these two instances were marked by splendid and exceptional service, such as can be only rendered by any individual to his country once in many centuries. It is not often in the history of the world that the opportunity for distinction is afforded, that fell to the lot of Grant and Lincoln. The opportunity came, and they made the most of it, for the noblest ends, and the worship of their memories is natural for all coming time. But in the case of Mr. Blaine, although one of the most popular politicians that the nation has seen for twenty-five years, occupying distinguished station, and with grand opportunity, his name is connected with no great act that will leave its impress on the public service, or live in history after he is dead, if we except the reciprocity treaties, and they had nothing to do with the popularity, for he was as popular before reciprocity was broached as he ever was after.

With president Harrison's friends the difference was marked—their friendship for their candidate was quiet, steady and firm as Gibraltar's rock. There was no shouting, no boasting, no fireworks, no unseemly noise; but every man could be counted on till the crack of doom. Here and there a traitor stole into their camp; notably one of the delegates from Brooklyn, who came as a delegate for Harrison, and then went over to the enemy. The poor creature only earned the bitter contempt of the friends he sought to serve, and the detestation and scorn of the friends he attempted to betray; he returned to his home to receive the reward of his treachery, thoroughly humiliated and disgraced.

The combatants are now all at home, and if the democrats expect to receive any comfort by the vindictive fight at Minneapolis, it would be just as well for them to keep their weather eye open for the November Ides. A republican fight looks like a very nice thing to outsiders, but it is like a fight between man and wife, something the outsiders had better let them settle it among themselves. The president's friends might be compared to one of Cæsar's Roman legions or Napoleon's old guard; they were steady under fire, courageous in the face of threatened defeat, and magnanimous in the hour of victory.

Mr. Blaine henceforth ceases to be a factor in American politics, for it is doubtful if any future combination of his party will call him from his retirement, after his late crushing defeat. But he will carry with him to his home in Maine the respect and affection of millions of his countrymen, who have loved and followed him as few men have been followed and loved, and who, if their votes could have done it, would have exalted him to the highest office in the gift of the American people.

Between this time and November some very lively work may be expected by both parties. The democrats, if they are wise, will do well not to underestimate the fighting qualities of the man who wears his grandfather's hat. And the republicans need not expect much comfort from Tammany, no matter who gets the nomination. The lines are well defined, both parties are in splendid fighting order. Now, go in, and may the best man win.—BROADBRIM.

The Doctors in Kingston.

Real merit brings success. Service first three months free. Hundreds go to see them. The great ability, candor and honor manifested by the celebrated German and English doctors, permanently located at 92 Queen street, has secured to them unparalleled success in Kingston. Four hundred and eighty-six received treatment during the past twenty-one days, while two hundred and seventy-eight were rejected as incurable. They treat all forms of chronic diseases, but accept no incurable case. If your malady is hopeless they will frankly and kindly tell you so, also advise you against spending money for useless treatment. It costs nothing to interview these eminent doctors. All who visit them before July 1st will receive service first three months free.

Catarrh and catarrhal deafness positively cured by their German treatment. Office hours 9 a.m to 8 p.m; Sunday 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. Cut this out and bring it with you.

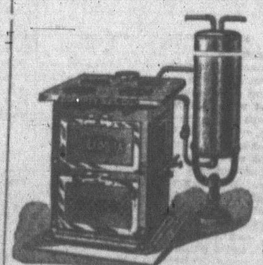
GAS STOVES



Among the many valuable features contained in these improved Gas Ranges, the following are worthy of special mention:—

THE OVENS are very large and well constructed, the heat being evenly distributed to all parts. They will bake, roast, broil and toast with much less labor and expense than either a coal or wood stove.

THE BURNERS are constructed on the most economical principles, giving a very powerful heat with a very small consumption of gas. In addition to this the valves are so made as to preclude any possibility of their being turned on or off by accident—a very important feature.

THE WATER HEATER is made on a new and greatly improved system, the same gas that does the cooking also utilised to heat the water for bath and kitchen purposes.

By this arrangement the cost of the separate water heating burner of the old system is saved almost entirely.
