EYRE'S ACQUITTAL.

BY HELEN B. MATHERS.

CHAPTER II.

"Seems like yesterday I were digging her grave," said the sexton, jerking his head toward the narrow green mound where Madcap Eyre lay with her child on her breast, and I'd sooner ha' dug his the first. I fust doubt me if the daisies and crocuses 'll ever spring as free above his as they shall o' her pretty heart. God bless her!

"If he'd been a poor man he'd lie at the cross-roads with a stake through his heart," said Nancy of the Mill, who stood with arms akimbo. "Lord! to think that she died as happy like a baby in its mother's arms. 'Tis said she fell so safe like, she didn't even kiss him before—and he'll never get near enough for her to kiss him now. God Almighty ought to never stand it."

"I never thought he'd a died till he'd swung some body or other for her," said the blacksmith, "for sure! 'a grave a-digging seems like a story. Like enough shot like in its middle. Tother world gets the end o't, and neither they nor us is a bit the wiser."

"Love begins all things and death ends 'em," said the gravedigger, sententiously; "half the sin in the world's born of the taste o' a cherry lip, and a gentle eye 'll sink many a soul as has kept the commandments from its youth up. 'Twas a most powerful true love as turned th' Squire from an honest man to a black-hearted sinner."

"He gave his soul for her," said a sad-faced woman who stood by; "and he couldn't do more for her if 'twas ever so. He knew that if ever she crossed to know about Hester Clarke, and the drowned child, he would kill her. 'Tis said that just afore she died she 'said 'twas the happiest moment of her life, and never knew 'twas her husband's hand that struck. . . . she went . . . after she had come out of the . . . sin."

"There's sin enough for you," cried Nancy, lifting up her hands, "if so be as he did stab her through jealousy, to hide beside her all through that night, holding the handkerchief to her mouth and not letting her come to herself one blessed minute, and the doctor saying 'twa' he, 'if she does, 'tis murder,' and the Squire looks up and say, 'What then?' O' Lord, what a sin!"

"It minds me of Othello," said a villain pedagogue, with his rusty coat tails swept his heels. "He killed his wife for jealousy, but there was no knife or chloroform . . . in Cyprus."

"The master had no call to be jealous," said Sally Grange, who had just joined the group; "he never loved but one, and he knew it."

"And what a part they made," said the gravedigger, resting on his spade, "so light-some, spirited, and beautiful! She'd walk beside master, but dance along side of t'other, seems like as if they two ought to swim here side by side . . . he left his heart wi' her the day we laid the mould above her."

"She were well loved," said the Sexton's wife, softly; "and for her sake the two men loved one another. 'Twas grand to see 'em standing shoulder to shoulder at the sixes. 'Twas the only speck o' virtue in master's character when he up an' said 'twas he, an' not the young Lord, as had brought Hester Clarke to shame, seemin' as if he didn't valy the world's opinion a groat, so long as she never heard the whisper o't."

"He was evet of a murderous sort of mind," said the pedagogue, shaking his head. "'Twas greatly in my mind, when he set out so quick after Lord Lovel, that revenge was at the bottom, for, though a man may kill his wife for love, he mostly kills her lover for hate."

"Very bookish talk," said the sexton, disparagingly. "Some more learning o' Othello, I s'pose, but them as sits down to write books is mostly pore creatures, and nat'rally the folks they set strutting on the page is like th'ersel'es . . . they ain't true to human nature. An' if you ticket a man wi' a deadly sin, an' expect him to act accordin', ten to one but he'll bust out with a bit o' virtue as'll make you feel as if you'd never knowed its right color before . . . an' if the master slew her as he loved best of all upon earth, 'tis ten to one 'twas for some reason as never entered into your Othello's or any of th' dummies' heads."

"Dummies!" ejaculated the pedagogue, furious at this insult to the creatures of his own dreaming; "you his own, but a posh from one of the crowd nearly precipitating him into the open grave compelled him to take an awkward leap backward, in the course of which his head met a tombstone that made him think of Othello with disgust for a week.

"The cause of the catastrophe was Job, who came to the very edge and looked down with bitter hatred at the yawning chasm.

"Dog it all," he said, "he's been the curse of me pore this many a year, and there's no knowing where his sins may spread up again. Just please God we've done with bad folks an' murderers now—a bad man, or not Job stinking his foot against the cumbrance with, he spoilt my little Master Frank's life, and made him carry on like . . . others a sin that . . . up the truth . . . I'm . . . it . . . there's naught but . . . 'll grow here . . . and weeds land . . . alongside . . . but, thank G. . . . I'm . . . my little Master Frank's safe . . . grave.

"He . . . 'a . . . 'a . . . 'a . . . up and . . . 'a . . . 'a . . . 'a . . . for the dew lying . . . for the sweet Nature's . . . after . . . closing in, and a chaly nest was . . . in special shapes about the . . . tombstones, and gathering . . . closely about the little group . . . and . . . a wind that shut out all objects . . . 'a . . .

"As . . . and the sexton's . . . down, but I'd rather . . . days was . . . and we'd get home . . . His Spirit were . . . was . . . anything . . . as it seems . . . spite is that he should be thrown in his . . . where . . . speak, wi' death . . . I mostly gets . . . hankers the dead face in . . . the whole . . . and gives its grave . . . but somehow I can't . . . the master's . . . 'a . . .

"You shall, within the hour," said Job, huskily; "and now I must be hastenin' back or the body'll be there afore me, and my little Master Frank'll be expectin' . . . —

"What was it that froze the words on his lips? Whose was this tall shape that loomed gigantic through the mist, and from which, after one shuddering glance all fell away, clutching at each other like drowning creatures in a sinking ship? Job's sinking effect, the vigor of youth rekindled in his veins, withered and grew old, as, with a lightning conviction of the truth, he stammered, "My master . . . where is my master?" Mr. Eyre looked down at the half-veiled chasm at his feet.

"His grave is already dug," he said, "and you have received my message. He lies at the house yonder."

"His gray . . . repeated Job, slowly and stupidly, "dropped . . . but he's alive . . . the message was from him . . . 'twas good both, he was bringing . . . his dinner's preparing, and his . . . set . . . My little Frank," he sobbed, "my dear, dear little Master Frank!" then seized Mr. Eyre's arm and . . . ck him like a reed, "did you kill him as you killed your wife?" he shrieked.

"He was killed in battle abroad," said Mr. Eyre, and his voice, hollow and worn, might have been a ghost's. "He had been an hour dead when I found him. I laid him in his coffin and brought him straight home. The message must have blundered on its way."

"But Job did not hear . . . by the side of that empty grave his faithful old heart broke, and, palsied and tottering, he had crept away home to where, for the first last time, his little Master Frank was waiting to receive him.

CHAPTER III.

"And . . . grave with a wish, my . . . ing lovingly at the gravedigger, and I've disappointed you, but it's a . . . t the love's labor lost. Lord Lovel loved my wife . . . and she him, and there's room for me on the other side. And they shall have no monument, and no stained glass yonder, but only the flowers they both loved, with the sun shining through them—and there 'll be no hedge to grow out of either heart but only a rose. And so you think I killed my wife?" he added, [illegible] the Grand [illegible]
