THE ROCK.

O Rock of Ages, stand on thee
By grace my feet are planted
Trusting in Omnipotent faith to see
The mighty angel descended,
Which angry billows round me rave,
And tempests fierce assail me,
To thee I cling, the tempest brave
For thou canst never fail me.
Though earth quits the globe with earthquake shock,
Unmoved I look stand at Eternity's Rock.

When thy cleftS I love to hide,
Then darkness is o'er me closed
Thine peace and light serene abide
And my still heart repose;
My soul exults to dwell secure,
Thy strong resistances round me;
She dares to count her triumph sure
Nor fears but he'll confound her;
Through tumults rent the earth and sea,
Thou changeless Rock, they shake not thee.

From thee, O Rock, once smitten, flow
Life-giving streams for ever
And whose doth drink, shall thirst no more
He henceforth thirsteth never.
My lips have touch'd the crystal tide
And feel no more returning
The fever that so long I tried
Thy cool, yet full, still burning
Ah wondrous well-spring, bringing over
With living waters evermore.

On that dread day when they that sleep
Shall hear the trumpet sounding,
And wake to praise, or wake to weep,
The judgment throne surrounding,
When, wrapped in all-devouring flame,
The gold globe is wasting,
And that last trumpet-sounding came
Echoed to nothing blasting;
Even then, my soul shall calmly rest
O Rock of Ages on thy breast.

PERFECTLY HEARTLESS.

"Pretty? Yes, rather, but perfectly heartless," said Mrs. Holmes to Dr. Stanley, a young and talented physician, with whom she was conversing at a large and Brilliant entertainment.

"Heartless" with that sensitive mouth and those eyes so full of expression," said the physician, musingly.

"I don't admire her style of beauty at all. She looks like a wax doll, and her heartlessness is proverbial. Since her uncle left her so wealthy she has had suitors by the score, and flirts with every one. Why, look at her now."

Dr. Stanley's eyes followed in the direction in which the lady waved her fan, and rested on the central figure of a group round the piano. It was a lady, young and fair, with a tall, exceedingly graceful figure, Greek features and large blue eyes. Her hair was short, but the soft full curls made a lovely frame to a fair face. Her dress, was of a dark lace, and twisted among the golden curls were deep crimson flowers, with dark green leaves, and on the snowy throat and arms glittered blood red rubies. She was conversing gaily with a knot of gentlemen, and Dr. Stanley sauntered over to the group.

"Miss Marston," said one gentleman, "what has become of Harold Graham, the artist."

The tiny hand swept over the ivory keys of the piano in the measure of a brilliant waltz, and another of the group, supposing Miss Marston did not hear the question said, "Out at the elbows and can't appear."

"He was wretchedly poor," said a third.

"Perhaps he has commited suicide. It is three weeks since he disappeared," said another.

"O, I hope not!" said Miss Marston; "we want his tenor in our next musical soiree. It would be too provoking for him to commit suicide."

"Mrs. Holmes was right," thought the doctor; "she is perfectly heartless. Poor Harold!"

He turned from the piano, but stopped as a full, rich voice broke out into song. Eva Marston was singing Shubert's Last Greeting; and into the mournful words she poured such wailing energy and deep pathos that group after group in the large rooms ceased their gay conversation to listen to the music.

"Can she sing so without heart or feeling?" muttered the doctor, again drawing near the piano.

"Eva," said a young lady, as the last notes of the song died away, "Eva, play a polka, won't you?"

A contemptuous smile quivered for a moment on Eva Marston's lip; then nodding good naturedly, she dashed off into a polka, which melted the group around the piano into merry dancers and Dr. Stanley with the rest.

The next morning Miss Marston sat in her room writing a letter: Let us peep over her shoulder, at one sentence.

"All hollow, all heartless, Mariam! You blame me for flirting, you are not sure, see how they follow me merely for my money, not one true heart among them all. There was one, Harold."

A knock at the door interrupted her.

"Come in!" and a needlewoman entered with a basket of work.

"Good morning, said Eva, pleasantly. "How is Terrence this morning?"

"Oh, Miss, it's beautiful he is to day, sure, marm. I'm sorry ye've had to wait so long for the needlework."

"Never mind that. How could you work with the poor fellow so ill?"

"Sure, miss, it's many one expects their work, sick or well, and sin Jerry sitting up the day playing with the toys ye sint him, and Pat, that I kept home from school a minding him."

"How much, Mary?" said Eva, taking out her purse.

"Oh, Miss, you don't owe Mary Gennis a farden. There's the doctor ye left the money to day—and the word ye sint—and the money ye gave me last week, sure, miss, it's in your debt I am for the rest of your life."

"What I gave Terrance has nothing to do with my bill," said Eva, rapidly counting out the money.

"Miss Eva," said the poor Irish needle woman—and then stopped.

"Well, Mary?"

"Sure, miss, you do so much good with your money, I'm ashamed to tell you—"

"Tell me what?"

"Well, miss, it's about a young gentleman that rented my room. Ye mind where the widder died last autumn. He came a week back, miss, and he never came down stairs for three days; so this morning I went up, and he was sick with a fever, out of his head entirely, miss. If you would come now."

"Wait, Mary, I'll go with you."

"He's dreadfully poor, I think; miss, for it's precious little furniture—nothing but a bed, and a table, and a chair, and no trunk at all, not a bit of carpet bag."

Throwing off her rich silk wrapper Eva put on a dark grey dress and cloak, and added a close fit bonnet and thick veil.

"Come, Mary," and the two left the house together.

In a low, close room, on a pallet bed, lay Mary Gennis' lodger. The face, against the coarse ticking, pillow was such as one fancies for that of his favorite poet. The hair was dark, waving over a broad, white forehead, and the deep set eyes were hazel, large and full, and the features delicate. Usually the face was pale, but now it was crimson with fever. The eyes, too, fierce and wild. But, even with all this, the face was beautiful with an almost unearthly beauty. In that poor, low room, Eva, with her sombre dress and radiant beauty, came like a pitying angel. She gave one glance at the invalid's face and then crossed to the room to hastide.

"Eva," said the sick man; "Eva!" drawing back. But the young man moaned her name again, and then broke forth in wild delirious ravings.

"Mary," said Eva, "send Patrick to me. I will find pencil and paper."

Mary left the room and Eva turned to the table to find paper and pencil. She wrote two hasty notes. One to her housekeeper for pillows and sheets. The other to Dr. Stanley, who did not conjecturing why was the friend that sent him so much practice among the poor patients, and saw the young physician was well paid.

Hather, despatched Patrick with the notes. Eva tried to make the desolate room look more homelike. Lifting from the table a sweet-scented something dropped from the pocket to the floor. She picked it up. It was a small miniature case, open, and painted on the ivory was Eva Marston's face.

A smile, gentle and pitying, came on her lip.

"He did love me, then—really love me, and I would not seek me with a herd of fortune hunters, and that is the reason I have missed him so long."

"Arrah, miss, here is the doctor!"

"Stop him, Mary. I will go in here. Remember, Mary, you don't know my name," and Eva went into another room, vacant, and adjoining that of the invalid's. The door stood ajar, and Mr. Stanley's exclamat on reach d her ears.

"Harold! have I found you at last, and in such a place as this."

Eva's eyes ranged over the capabilities of the room, in which she stood, and she nodded. It will do—larger and better than the other, but a poor place at best.

The next day when Dr. Stanley called to see his patient, Mary, with a participated pride, ushered him into the room that had been vacant before. A soft carpet was on the floor, and a fire in the grate. Soft muslin curtains, snowy white, draped the window. The bed could scarcely be recognized, yet as pure white pillows counterpane and sheets. A little table stood beside the bed with the medicines the doctor had ordered, and a decanter of cooling drink.

"The lady, ye mind I told ye of, that sent ye to Terry," said Mary. "We arranged the room yesterday, and our Joe I mean and I moved him to day, so she'll find him here when she comes. It's asleep he's been for better than four hours, sir."

Two hours later Harold was asleep, but then he opened his eyes. The cold cheerless room was changed, as if by enchantment, and Harold, thought he was dreaming, an angel face bent over him with pitying eyes, and a tender smile, tender as a mother's over her child.

Eva? he whispered. "Oh, that I could die in such a dream, and never wake to the bitter, hopeless love! Let me die now."

Was it a dream, that sweet, low voice answering him?

"Harold, you will not die! you will live for me! Your genius shall be recognized, your pictures sought. No more struggling for life, but only for fame!" and the tears fell as she spoke.

Dr. Stanley stood in the doorway, recognized the hall room belle, and the object of his friend's long, silent, hopeless love.

Softly he glided down the stairs, for he knew that a better medicine than he could prescribe was within the patient's grasp.

And the world said, "Just think of Eva Marston, rich, and such a belle, marrying Harold, Graham, the artist, who was as poor as a church mouse."

TENNESSEE LEGISLATURE.

Quarrelsome Members Call Each Other Pretty Rough Names.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that Mr. Littleton was here in the interest of Mr. Shelley, a Republican; and that he offered to compensate me if I would vote for his Republican friend. He offered to aid me in coming to the Senate at the next election if I would aid him in his infamous scheme. He said if Mr. Shelley was elected he was to be virtually Secretary of State, that he was to run the office. I spurned his infamy and insulted him to get rid of him. In response to his vile attack on me, read by the Clerk, I have to say Mr. Speaker, that it is an infamous lie from beginning to end, so far as I am concerned, and I stand responsible here or elsewhere for what I say. In vindication for myself I demand the appointment of a committee to investigate the base charges made by Mr. Littleton, who is a liar, scoundrel, coward and poltroon.

THOMPSON SAYS "YOU'RE ANOTHER."

Mr. Thompson in reply said that he would feel very bad if what he said about traitors on the day previous was without influence. He had lived for fifty eight years, and was descended from the oldest families in Tennessee. His ancestors were the first white people in the State and they had occupied every office within the gift of the State, from the Governorship down to the magistracies, and had won proud distinction in the battle field. He had never done any thing that was unworthy of his or their reputation, and no gentleman should place him in any such attitude, and if the gentleman from Putnam and White (Mr. Davis) meant to reflect upon him or to insinuate that he had done anything not becoming a gentleman, he would apply to him the same epithet that the gentleman from Putnam and White had applied to the other man, and say that he was a liar, a scoundrel and a coward.

THRESHING FOR BLOOD.

Mr. Plummer said that he denounced the author of the letter (Littleton) as a liar, a coward and a poltroon, and that he was solicited and offered $250 by Littleton to vote for Shelley, which he declined to do, voting for Baxter.

Both Davis and Plummer asked for an investigation and a resolution was adopted to that effect. There seems to be blood on the face of the moon, and it is thought that the affair will end in a bloody encounter.

A Good Account.

"To sum it up, six long years of bed ridden sickness and suffering, costing $200 per year, total, $1,200 all of which was stopped by three bottles of Hop Bitters taken by my wife, who has done her own housework for a year since without the loss of a day, and I want everybody to know it for their benefit."
