ENGLAND'S DANGER.

What an American Observer Thinks.

(Mr. Conway's London Letter.)

If the better sense of England were now free to express itself, there would be some chance of the nation's recognizing the Mephistophelian character of the European influences which are endeavoring to get them into a war with Russia. Although the French would be very sorry to have their exhibition spoiled, yet even that interest is largely subordinated to the desire that England, who saw them humble by Germany without raising a finger, shall have an opportunity of suffering the like. The French now see England making a great row about Roumania losing Bessarbia; but why did England give no sign when Germany took Alsace and Lorraine! It would give France some of that satisfaction which her Rochefoucauld says people derive from the misfortunes of their best friends if she could see England meditating over a Sedan of her own on the importance of French allies in great schemes. That Germany should be animated by a similar desire to see England reduced is but natural. If England were defeated by Russia—or even welcomed by Russia—there would be but one first-class power in Europe. Julius Cæsar would be eclipsed by a Prince Bismarck, with France, England, and Russia all hobbling on crutches, and all the nations holding out their hats for any thing he might choose to toss into them. If England and Russia go to war, the only nation that can possibly get anything by it is Germany, and if this country were not infatuated it could read in the Berlin official press—now pro-Russian, now pro-English—the exact part played by those who set dogs by the ears in a ring. And this is Europe, Anno Christi 1878! Every great state animated by envy, hatred, and malice; peoples that might be mutually helpful pitted against each other by intriguing politicians and selfish rulers; every big nation chuckling at the prospect of the other suffering direst calamities, and the country which, on the whole and when in its right senses is freest and most cultured among them all (England) led by adventurers to the verge of a wild and guilty war with a nation from which it never suffered a wrong.

From hundreds of reported cases where patients have increased in weight from five to forty pounds while using Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites, no doubts remain of its powerful action on the organs of nutrition.

It is very safe to say that the most fastidious guest never leaves the Colonnade Hotel, Philadelphia, Pa., dissatisfied with his visit to that famous hostelry.
