A Daniel Come to Judgment,

A judgment worthy of Solomon was recently rendered by a French court. A year ago an apothecary of Port d'Ain in the department of Ain married a second time. It is the custom in that part of the country to treat all who take a second wife to a charivari, although any person may avoid the nuisance by paying a specified ransom. Our apothecary would not pay, and the sport was begun. The serenading party kept at their self-imposed task from sundown till midnight. The next night they began again, and, although the victim of their unwished-for music offered to pay half the sum they demanded, persisted for four days, or rather nights, in disturbing his peace. At last, on the fourth night, the apothecary, exasperated beyond endurance, dispersed his tormentors by sprinkling them with a mild solution of sulphuric acid. One or two of the volunteer musicians received injuries to their clothing, and one was somewhat burned in the face. Accordingly, the apothecary was arrested and brought before a judge, who sentenced him to pay certain small sums to each of the complainants. From this judgment he appealed, and it is the second verdict on appeal which is to be commended. The tribunal of Bourg held that the persons who were injured by vitriol had a right to compensation from the assailant, and, therefore, confirmed the judgment of the court below, but condemned each one of those in whose favor a verdict had been rendered to pay to the pharmacist as much as he was to pay for the assault.
