

SUPREME COURT WILL NOT HEAR ZONE CASE PLEA

Winnetka Loses Fight in Test
Case on Use of Center Street
Properties

The village of Winnetka has lost its fight in defense of the village zoning ordinance as applied to the properties of Paul Reschke, 706 Center street, and A. G. Erikson, 710 Center street.

On Monday the United States Supreme court refused to review a decision of the Illinois Supreme court last May, outlawing the ordinance on the ground that it violated the men's constitutional rights.

The decision, however, as pointed out by Village Manager H. L. Woolhiser, affects only the two properties involved, and in no wise applies to other Center street properties zoned residential.

Found For Village

Starting early last spring, these cases have now run the gamut of jurisprudence. In the first hearing, Judge George Fred Rush, in the Circuit court of Cook county, found for the village and enjoined the two men from violating the ordinance, by using their places for business, as well as residence purposes.

When taken by the defendants, on appeal, to the Illinois Supreme court, the cases were reversed and remanded to the court of Cook county, with directions to render decrees enjoining the village and its officers from interfering with Mr. Reschke in conducting a contractor's plant, or storage yard upon his premises, and from similar interference with Mr. Erikson in conducting a carter's express, hauling, or storage yard on his premises.

The properties, also occupied as residences, are located on the west side of Center street, between Pine street and Westmoor road, and are zoned residential.

Called "Unreasonable"

The Illinois Supreme court, in reversing the Circuit court, pointed out that railroads in front of the properties, nonconforming properties to the north and industrially zoned and nonconforming property in the south of the same block, make the zoning ordinance "unreasonable, confiscatory and void," if permitted to restrict the appellants to a residence use of their properties.

William N. Brady and Royal J. Schmidt are the attorneys representing Mr. Reschke and Mr. Erikson.
